

President Rogers brings vision, visibility

By Brian Watson and Peter Van Emburgh

A few office alterations, house renovations and an empty campus were not enough to stop the University's new president, Steffen H. Rogers, from beginning a new era at Bucknell.

Upon his arrival this summer, Rogers was met with numerous obstacles but has quickly settled into his new role with a sense of determination, focus and enthusiasm.

With the University entering into a transition year, Rogers' experience and vision will serve as a guiding light. So far, he has shown that the future is bright.

"It's been a great experience so far," Rogers said. "It was fun to watch the campus come back to life for the first time."

While making minor cosmetic changes to the President's house on University Avenue, Physical Plant workers found numerous structural problems that took months to repair.

Rogers and his wife, Athena, have settled comfortably into the residence; they even held open houses for the faculty and students yesterday and today, respectively.

Rogers understands the importance of remaining visible on campus despite his demanding travelling schedule. He and Athena have made extensive efforts to interact with University members, and have become "Bison regulars," frequently eating lunch with various students.

Despite working at two heavily-populated campuses before coming to the University, the new president has had prior experience at schools of comparable populations. He looked forward to returning to a tightly-knit campus community and seeks to maximize his professional and personal relationships with both students and staff.

"You've got to remember that I spent 21 years at the University of Tulsa. Everyone thinks it's a big school which it's not," Rogers said. "I grew up professionally in that atmosphere. I really enjoyed my experience at University of Rhode Island and Clemson. But I really missed that [intimate] atmosphere."

Despite the initial difficulties,

Rogers promises to be a visible presence.

Praise for new residence hall

New dorm eases crowded dorms, enriches community living

By Natalie Casp

Say goodbye to Hotel Smith and welcome to campus the newest envy of Hiltons across the country. At $14 million, the New Residence Hall eases the problem of overcrowding while providing modern amenities to its pleased student residents.

Two hundred eighty-eight residents, two thirds of whom are freshman, spread out in the 98,000 square feet of oversized lounges and bedrooms. Each of the 16 neighborhoods is positioned around a glass-enclosed lounge with a kitchen, color television and ample room to gather with hallmates.

The committee in charge of designing and planning the building wanted to provide a modern living space for students. According to Director of Housing and Residential Life Daniel C. Remley, "Whenever any renovation or new construction occurs on campus, our office, as well as the Dean of Students Office, must take the needs of students into consideration."

"The lounges were created to provide a sense of community within the neighborhoods and we wanted the lounges to be equipped accordingly," Remley continued. "The student room furnishings are comparable to other residential halls and are up to current University standards."

The development committee, consisting of students, deans, faculty and physical plant representatives, considered several housing options before deciding on the podular model of the New Residence Hall.

"There is a lot of forethought about what style of residential hall is right for Bucknell. The goal here was to make a big building a small intimate community," said Jim Hostetter, associate director

Class of 2004 competitive, diverse

By Laura Day

Having trouble coming to terms with the realization that you're back at school? Don't worry, you're not alone. 916 new faces the joined the University community this year, making the class of 2004 one of the largest yet.

Admissions received 7,511 applications—the most of any year to date—forcing the University to accept fewer applicants than usual. 42 percent of applicants were admitted with 29 percent accepting.

The outlook for Bucknell seems overwhelmingly positive. Not only has the augmentation of high school students looking favorably at Bucknell been significant, but the qualifications of the students have also been on the rise. Average SAT scores of the admitted students have increased; 58 percent of the freshmen ranked in the top 10 percent of their graduating class and 83 percent ranked in the top 20 percent of their class.

The diversity of the student body is also continuing to increase: students from Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey make up 60 percent of the entering class; 12 percent of students are from the New England States; 9 percent are from the West/Northwest areas; 9 percent are from the Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and Washington, D.C. areas; 5 percent are from the North Central U.S.; 3 percent are from the South; and 2 percent are international students. With the University's Plan for Diversity continuing to prosper, our campus will continually be enriched by each student's personal and cultural contributions.

The Class of 2004 is also diverse in its academic interests. The College of Arts and Sciences continues to attract a large number of students, with 45 percent of the class enrolled in the curriculum. Engineering and the Sciences are second, each with 21 percent of the Freshmen Class. Three percent of the students will enter the education curriculum, and 10 percent wish to pursue a Management curriculum.

The University's national reputation is continuing to grow each year, as are the students' individual success rates. The future is opportunity-filled, so shake off the nerves and "school times blues," and make the acquaintance of the Class of 2004.

Ferraro does recognize that he

Rogers' views

President Steffen H. Rogers sat down recently with Brian Watson and Pete Van Emburgh to discuss his views on several campus issues.

Greeks:

"I support the Greek System, but I also think there's a certain level of responsibility that goes along with that. I think that they can be a part of the solution [to alcohol issues], rather than necessarily having to be a part of the problem."

Alcohol Issues:

"We want to provide the positive incentive for people to do something besides drinking—a program that would involve alcohol education and other alternatives. We're gonna work with the dormitories and off-campus situation—it's not just about the Greeks."

Diversity:

"We have to have a proactive plan both on the faculty and on the student recruiting side. We did a lot better this year—we're headed down the right track."

Students gain new Dean

Optimistic Ferraro enters position ready to address issues

By Heather Napolitano

Students returning to campus this fall are finding major reorganization in the administrative offices on campus, and in the midst of this shuffle Richard Ferraro begins his career as the University's new dean of students.

Ferraro was selected to fill this position last spring, and officially began his term on June 6.

"I'm very excited about being here," Ferraro said. "There's an excellent staff, and the students I am meeting are great. They have a lot of energy and ideals."

As the dean of students at the University, Ferraro will now concern himself with student living at large and the full range of offices that support it. The organizations include those pertaining to housing, student activities, student government, the judicial system, the conduct code, orientation, volunteer activities, student health, psychological services and career services.

In defining his own role at the University Ferraro said, "A lot of what I try to do and what I'm about is trying to help students maximize their education through what they learn in student living. That is something the staff and I are very committed to."

will face some challenges in the upcoming years. "Certainly there are some issues that we are going to have to deal with," he said.

He anticipates the first to be the perennial issue of alcohol. He cites this as a primary concern because the University is located in a very conservative environment in terms of both the town and the state, and it is a law that students do not drink until they reach the age of 21. However, the alcohol issue also encompasses responsible drinking. Ferraro finds a serious need for education on this topic.

"In summary, my feeling about alcohol ... is that it's very important that we deal with questions of use and abuse, and that we really work with students in a way that will help resolve those issues and ultimately help them support their education and do very well here," Ferraro said.

A second significant challenge Ferraro expects to meet pertains to town-gown relations. Although steps have been taken in the recent past to improve the relationship between the University and the surrounding community, Ferraro feels that more could be done. "The relationship with the town has not been strong," he said, "and I think it could be better."

He further believes that issues related to diversity and a better understanding of gender matter will require attention in the upcoming years.

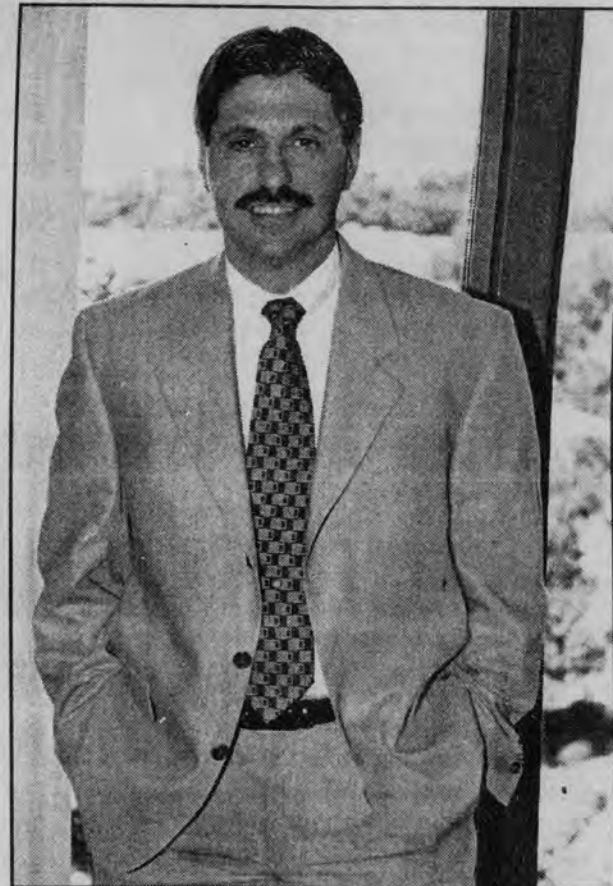

With these challenges defined, Ferraro has also outlined a clear set of goals for his office as he begins his work at the University.

"My major goal, my baseline goal, is student satisfaction. I want it to be a situation where students really do enjoy their time here and get the best and most out of their experiences," he said.

Ferraro would also like to strive towards making the greek system at the University a model system for other colleges to turn to and feels that the fraternities, sororities and Dean Baker are already taking steps towards that end.

"I think there's a fair amount of criticism directed [at the greek system here], but I think part of that is because we have high expectations. I think there are a lot of things going on with fraternities and sororities where they're really taking initiatives to develop themselves," he said. "I think sometimes people don't understand the good they do."

Ferraro's other goals include the development of leadership pro-

Marsha Lewis fills BSG void

By Jennifer Jenchura

After Bucknell Student Government (BSG) President Chris Bouchoux '01, decided to withdraw from the University this summer for personal reasons, current Vice President of Operations, Marsha Lewis '02, stepped in to replace him.

"The by-laws of the BSG constitution automatically designate the vice president of operations as the new president," BSG advisor Dean Karl Conrad said.

Lewis, who has been involved with BSG since her first year at the University, was Freshman Class President. Last spring, Lewis was elected to become the vice president of operations; therefore it was no surprise to Lewis to learn that she would take over the duties as president.

"One of the responsibilities [the vice-president of operations entails] includes taking the place of the president in situations in which the president is absent," Lewis said.

"The transition will be rather easy," said Nate Sorber '02, Vice President of Finance. "Of course there will be different personal styles, but Marsha has a lot of experience."

"I don't think that this will impact the effectiveness of the BSG organization as we have a very strong officer group," Conrad said. "Marsha has proven her leadership."

Lewis will officially be sworn in as the new president at the BSG meeting on Sept. 10. A new vice-president of operations for the fall semester will then be elected by the BSG Congress.

"The by-laws of the constitution mandate that anyone who has had at least one semester of BSG experience is eligible to run," Conrad said. "The candidates will address the Congress for approximately three minutes and then Congress will vote."

No one on the executive board is expected to run for the vacant position and Lewis is not expected to vote unless there is a tie.

BSG plans to move forward with the agenda that was outlined last spring when Bouchoux was president. Both Lewis and Sorber pinpoint cable television and expanded reading days as key issues for the upcoming semester.

Sorber says he plans to spend this semester looking at the number figures in the "feasibility and practicality of cable television in dorms. Most rooms have cable wiring already but no jack."

Sorber also says BSG would like to add at least one more reading day prior to final exams or revolve the reading period around a weekend. This would extend the number of days in a semester.

"[Cable and reading day issues] are two immense tasks that I want BSG to focus on so that we may come to some sort of conclusion," Lewis said. "However, we are going to have an agenda setting meeting in which we will think of other projects to focus on. Also, we the executive board have casually met with new University President, Steffen Rogers."

Sorber said "As student leaders, I think we are all excited to work with President Rogers. We

Athena Rogers embraces new University family

By Rebecca Rowland

When President Steffen Rogers accepted the position of the University's presidency and moved to Lewisburg from South Carolina with his wife Athena, one might assume that their decision was filled with apprehension; apprehension about leaving a large school for a small one, the south for the north and a place that the Rogers' had made their home since 1996 for unfamiliar surroundings.

"This was not the case. 'We looked upon it as the opportunity to start a new phase in our lives,' Athena Rogers said. 'We were gaining a new family and all the wonderful things that went along with it.'"

"We have followed Bucknell throughout the years in the world of academia," she said. "The national reputation of the students, stature of its faculty and staff; it sets itself apart from other universities of fine character—it is at the top of its national recognition."

"Being the family team that we are, this was the perfect opportunity for us to continue in academia in the most effective way and the most beautiful way," Mrs. Rogers continued. "We cannot think of anything we would rather be doing."

President and Mrs. Rogers have been a team since 1964, the year they married after meeting as undergraduate students at Georgia Southern University.

"Steffen dated my roommate for two-and-a-half years before we became a couple," Rogers fondly recounted. "I just waited for him to come to his senses because I knew I was in love with him and that I was going to marry him, I just had to wait my turn!"

And it was well worth the wait it was; since 1964 the Rogers' have traveled up and down the East Coast, fulfilling personal and professional goals, including furthering their education and beginning their careers as accomplished educators and administrators.

While in Nashville where President Rogers was completing his graduate work at Vanderbilt University, Mrs. Rogers took her first teaching position in a local parochial school, teaching courses at many different K-12 levels each day.

After teaching at the private level for two years, Mrs. Rogers accepted a position in the Davidson County Public School system at the elementary level. It was during this time that Rogers pursued accreditation at the elementary level at the Peabody School. It was also during that time when she experienced an event that would mark her life as a teacher.

"It was in Nashville that I taught a fifth grade student to read by using comic strips from a newspaper," Mrs. Rogers said. "The story would build each day and it was with much excitement that he would want to read and share his cartoons with the class."

"It pleased me very much because he had been a timid student with no idea how to read and then he became very confident and wanted to share what he could read with the class. That is one of the highlights of my life as an educator."

After Nashville the Rogers' moved to Baltimore where Mrs. Rogers taught at a progressive, non-graded elementary school, and then to Tulsa, Oklahoma, where they remained for 21 years.

During those years Rogers earned her Masters Degree at Oklahoma State University and again worked as a teacher and principal in the local public elementary schools.

"Living in Tulsa was a wonderful experience," Mrs. Rogers said. "Steffen and I both feel as though we grew up professionally and personally while we were there. We were given very diverse opportunities in our careers and never found ourselves to be bored with our location or experiences."

Following the death of the president of the University, though, the Rogers' felt a change was needed and President Rogers accepted a position as Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at Rhode Island University.

Rogers continued her career as educator and administrator in Rhode Island and then focused on returning to the classroom in South Carolina where the Rogers' moved after President Rogers accepted the position of Vice Provost and Vice President of Academic Affairs at Clemson University.

"I wanted to teach something I had not taught before so I chose to teach seventh grade," Rogers said. "I picked seventh grade because middle school has children of ages 12, 13 and 14 and those years fascinated me at the time. As everyone knows, seventh graders are always spoken of as a challenge, but we loved each other and it was a wonderful experience."

Rogers chose to end her career on that brave note, retiring June 1, 2000.

"I knew when I retired that I had a new life ahead of me with my new children, the students at Bucknell," Rogers said. "They may smile when I say 'children' but in my heart they are my children and I am so very happy to be here."

Now that the school year has started, Rogers has great plans to become a visible presence on campus, joining in on student activities as often and appropriately as possible.

"That is my life; it won't be a job for me, it is the nature of my being here at Bucknell," Rogers said. "I feel so comfortable here, I feel that I have been embraced not only by the University but also by the town. The townspeople have made us feel like we have lived here our whole lives."

The University will provide the Rogers' with a contrasting experience to the one they had at Clemson. The smaller size of the University will allow the Rogers' to interact with students and faculty on a much more intimate level, something that both see as integral to the role of first family.

"At a small school you get to know people, you get to feel the pulse and know the heartbeat of others," Rogers said. "You cry when they cry, you smile when they smile, you work with others to make sure things are happening in the most positive and productive way."

"When I think of students and faculty," Mrs. Rogers said, "I think, 'these are my new friends and I can not wait to meet each and every one of them.'"

The Rogers' will hold an open house for students tonight at their home after having held an open house for faculty and staff last night. Mrs. Rogers promises that this will not be a one-time event, and that they have daily plans to become engrossed with the University community.

"Here at Bucknell it is as if we have come home, and our home is your home," Rogers said. "At this point it is just the beginning of what we see as the perfect marriage."

the highly successful capital campaign led by former president William D. Adams, Rogers is formulating a ten-year plan for the University which he calls "Vision 2010."

"This is the only University that I would propose a 10-year plan because I know it could work," he said. "Bucknell is very well-known and respected, but it is better than its national reputation."

"You have to have a plan otherwise you don't know what you'll look like down the road."

Rogers realizes the enormous responsibilities his office entails, but he plans to meet the campus community's high expectations and maximize the University's national image.

"Chris was an excellent person to work with. The personal friendship is something we will miss, but I think a little of his professionalism has rubbed off on all of us," Sorber said. "It should be more than a club, it is a student administrative body."

Despite Bouchoux's absence, Sorber is confident in Lewis' ability to lead the BSG.

"Marsha will do a great job," Sorber said. "She is a competent worker and people respect her."

BCEJ satisfied with Rogers' decision

By Brian Watson

Last April, the Bucknell Caucus for Economic Justice (BCEJ) issued an open letter to then-incoming University President Steffen H. Rogers describing their disapproval of a letter sent to Dining Services workers by Vice President for Finance and Administration Peggy Plympton regarding union membership.

Their letter asked Rogers to re-evaluate its impact and urged him to cease delivery. The BCEJ appeal got Rogers' attention, and the new president has decided to stop sending the letter.

"The BCEJ feels that President Rogers' decision indicates, in part, that students and faculty can influence University procedures and effect change for greater social and economic justice on campus when they take a stand," BCEJ member Sandra Morris, associate professor of English and senior fellow for social justice, said.

Morris and co-BCEJ member Charles Sackrey, chair and associate professor of economics, met with Rogers last month and said he was very receptive to their cause. A Bucknellian exclusive last April displayed the letter as well as a copy of Plympton's letter, which Morris and Sackrey viewed as "misleading" and "coercive." They felt that the letter influenced Dining Services workers to resist union inclusions.

Plympton said last April that the letter was sent to "make sure that employees have both sides of the picture, that they understand what the advantages and disadvantages of unions are."

In the open letter, the BCEJ wrote that distribution of the letter violated the University's Mission Statement, which they said sets the "high moral ground" on which the University should function.

Sackrey was satisfied with Rogers' decision, viewing it as a victory for their cause. "President Rogers agreed with us that there was great inequality in compensation at most universities," Sackrey said. "We hope President Rogers will conclude that such a situation contradicts the commitment to 'justice' in Bucknell's Mission Statement."

Rogers spoke briefly about the issue. "Bucknell wants to do the right thing," he said. "In no sense should the administration ever be viewed as intimidating. I don't think that was the intent before."

Morris echoed Sackrey's sentiments, saying, "The real concern of the BCEJ was not unionization, but such issues as worker dignity, institutional morality, and establishment of decent working conditions for all people employed at Bucknell."

"We are all very pleased with President Rogers' decision to reverse Bucknell's longstanding practice of sending the coercive, condescending, and misleading letter it has distributed in the past," she continued.

of construction and planning. "The podular model was the right design at the right time for Bucknell."

Community living comes easy for residents of the hall. Uphill Residential Life Coordinator Victor Arcelus commented that he sees the residents actively engaging in community-building activities. "At all hours, the lounges are filled with students. It's the heart of the neighborhood."

The Residential Assistants of the New Residence Hall, according to Arcelus, "cook and interact with their residents in the lounges. I've received wonderful feedback from the RAs in that the design of the building naturally facilitates the community building process."

Both the Residential College program and the Language program occupy neighborhoods in the building. Faculty presence is also high in the building; several professors requested that first-year students in their foundation seminars live in the building.

Two wooden cathedral seminar classrooms are located on the second floor, across from the spacious common study lounge. The decision to place academic programs in the building came easy, according to Remley. "We always like to evaluate space and provide as much connectivity for faculty-student interaction."

With the New Residence Hall, space is no longer a pressing issue for the Office of Housing and Residential Life. The original purpose of the building was to relieve overcrowding in Swartz, Roberts and Larison Halls. The "dingles" in Swartz Hall are gone and some 30 grams, the expansion of housing options in the long run, the review and analysis of the conduct system and the creation of a closer working relationship with the academic departments.

Faced with this extensive list of challenges, Ferraro is well prepared as he enters with considerable past experience. Following his years as an undergraduate at Cornell University and a graduate at Johns Hopkins and the University of Wisconsin at Madison, he began a lengthy career in administration at the University of Wisconsin at Madison, Emory University, the College of William and Mary and Columbia University.

Members of the administration are very pleased with the new addition to their staff. Associate Dean of Students Gerald Comerford said that he is "extremely confident" in Ferraro's ability to successfully fill this position.

"Students are his number one priority," Comerford said.

This confidence in Ferraro is echoed by Baker who said, "He has an extremely open mind. In the long run, if he continues to keep this open mind and reach out to the students and bring his ideas to the table—which have been right on the money so far—then I think he will be an extremely effective dean of students."

Tire company faces loss of nearly $5 billion, second largest tire recall in history

Tim Choate—The Bucknellian

Defective Firestone tires have effected Ford Explorers across the country.

By Tom Elliott

Bridgestone/Firestone Inc.'s problems continue as they face the second largest tire recall ever, in addition to the threat of strikes at some union plants.

The number of deaths resulting from faulty tires has now jumped to 88, according to the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA).

The recall is the second largest in history, falling just short of the 7.5 million-tire mark that Firestone was forced to recall in 1978.

A potential strike scheduled at nine union plants for Labor Day was averted when an agreement was met late the night before. This settlement affects about 9,000 workers, who now have contract extensions that expire in 2003.

Over 1,400 complaints have been filed as a result of certain makes of Firestone tires that experienced blown tires, tread separation and other problems. The recall includes several new models, which brings the total to 6.5 million tires. The fiasco is expected to cost Firestone approximately $5 billion.

Foreign countries with the tires, Venezuela's consumer protection agency asked for a formal investigation of the matter. Venezuelan officials are claiming that faulty tires have led to 46 deaths.

The Venezuelan Firestone plant based in Caracas is now recalling 62,000 tires, the same tires being recalled in the United States, most of which come with the Ford Explorer. The finger pointing has broadened as the accusations grow. Firestone, not a stranger to recalls, has taken much of the heat for the faulty tires.

The majority of the problems have occurred with the Ford Explorer, on which many of the tires come standard, traveling at highway speed. Questions are now hovering, concerning the time span between Ford's realization of the problems and their public acknowledgment of them.

In 1989 Ford found that the Explorer had difficulty passing standard vehicle rollover safety tests, while the tires were inflated at 35 pounds per square inch as Firestone recommended. They found that at 25 pounds per square inch the cars passed the tests, so they used that level as their recommendation to the car buyers. Firestone meanwhile continued to recommend at least 30 pounds per square inch.

Blowouts result from a less-than-adequate amount of tire air pressure. Conversely, the higher the inflation level, the higher the risk of a rollover.

Ford originally asserted that the problems from overseas were stemming from drivers' abuse on the tires, but Ford is now revising this previous statement to include air pressure as one of the factors.

The NHTSA is now bearing some of the heat as well. The organization is responsible for reducing death, injuries and economic loss from motor vehicle accidents. NHTSA relied heavily on the companies to voluntarily supply safety information, and its poor statistical database has helped mask potential dangers to consumers.

Nuclear threat shakes South Asia

By Tim Scheu

With the recent succession of test ban and arms reduction treaties, appears that the world has overcome the nightmare of nuclear holocaust. The United States has successfully negotiated the elimination of nuclear stockpiles within the former USSR, and with Clinton's recent deferral of the missile defense system the United States is leading the way towards nuclear deterrence. But while many in the west are basking in their diplomatic successes, political insiders are concerned that a situation in South Asia is threatening global security.

In 1998, both India and Pakistan broke an international test ban treaty by detonating nuclear devices in quick succession. The move alerted the global community to the growing friction between these neighboring countries, and quickly demonstrated the threat posed by developing countries.

Following President Clinton's visit to the subcontinent last spring, the CIA released a report that identified the possibility of a hot war developing as 50/50. They also sighted a distinct possibility that such a war could ultimately conclude in a nuclear strike.

The heart of the conflict lies over the disputed territory of Jammu and Kashmir, a mountainous region on the borders of China, India, and Pakistan. Estimates vary, but it is suspected that over the past 11 years a series of terrorist attacks has left more than 25,000 people dead. In the last month, calls for peace talks have been violently ignored as grenades and car bombs have taken dozens of additional lives.

Arguably, the greatest cause for concern is that neither country has the ability to successfully deter the other's nuclear threat. Their stockpiles are relatively limited with respect to China and the United States, and neither one has the ability to wipe out the opposing country. This, in theory, would pave the way for a tactical nuclear strike, one which could cripple the others' weapons system, leaving the country in a state of disarray where the victim would not be able to retaliate.

The two states have been rivals for years, splitting along both political and religious lines. India, whose population is now approaching one billion, is mainly composed of Hindus, with pockets of Christianity and Islam mixed in. Pakistan, whose population is roughly the same as the United States, is predominantly Islam.

Communication has also been a problem. In 1998 a military coup ousted the democratically elected president of Pakistan replacing him with Gen. Pervez Musharraf, and the ensuing government has attracted suspicion from India. "The conflict lies in the very nature of Pakistan," Indian Defense Minister Georges Fernandes said. "Pakistan's belief that Kashmir should be part of it is based upon the theocratic nature of its state, something that is unacceptable to us." Likewise, Pakistan's U.N. Ambassador, Shamsad Ahmad noted that, "prospects for talks are not very bright because of India's very negative attitude towards the Musharraf government."

In addition, the countries' proximity to China is of growing concern. Any arms race between India and Pakistan would most likely spark a similar response from China. Such actions would distort the existing balance of power and would ultimately threaten global security.

So what does this mean to the United States? India and Pakistan are on the other side of the world, so how is it that such a war would have a profound effect on American lives?

If one takes a step back to compare this conflict to the Cold War, the severity of the situation becomes clear. The fact that the conflict is over disputed territory discourages cooperation, as the source of conflict is tangible rather than ideological. The two sides of the conflict are representative of two religions, whose origins are passionate and not abstract political ideologies. In addition, these countries, though highly populated, are not major players on the global stage, and are attempting to use nuclear threat to muscle their way into the international spotlight.

Though Pakistan has a history of military leaders (25 years of military rule in 53 years of independence) a standard has been set, in that "justice" is served by taking it forcefully. With that mindset, what is to stop them from starting a war with India, one which could ultimately lead to a nuclear strike?

A nuclear strike sets a precedent. How does an international governing body punish a country for detonating a nuclear device? Sanctions would surely only be a slap on the wrist for a crime that does immeasurable damage. And besides, India and Pakistan already have sanctions against them for violating the test ban treaty. If other developing countries recognize that such an act will go unpunished, then who is to stop them from exercising similar judgment against rivals?

In a recent visit to India, Japanese Prime Minister Yoshiro Mori and his aides reiterated the need for nuclear proliferation. "I would just like you to understand the sentiment of the Japanese people, who solely experienced the disaster of atomic bombs in the world." For the sake of global security, one hopes Musharraf keeps that in mind.

Voter apathy or independent thought?

By Josh Guyan

Are you ready to vote?

A poll conducted this weekend found that 65 percent of respondents were registered to vote and 80 percent plan on voting in this presidential election year. That is much higher than one would assume, with regard to voter apathy, especially among young people, and the decisive lack of political climate here at Bucknell. One can only hope the actual Bucknell voter turnout is 80 percent.

The poll was conducted over two days of random phone calls and respondents included 12 females and eight males, ages ranging from 17 to 21, five Democrats, three Republicans, and five Independents. When asked whom they were voting for there were 4 votes for Bush, 4 for Gore, and 14 undecided.

This is fairly consistent with the nation at large. Independents have taken over as the largest block of voters (our unscientific poll ended up with a few too many Democrats) and the race is essentially even between Bush and Gore nationally. The main distinction between Bucknell and the nation at large is that 70 percent of the Bucknell respondents are undecided in contrast with 12 percent of the nation in the latest Newsweek poll.

There are a few possible explanations for this large difference. It is certainly possible that Bucknell students simply haven't paid enough attention to the campaigns to know enough to make an educated decision at this point.

Another possibility is that the students know quite a bit about both candidates, but in keeping with the trend towards more and more people, especially young people, registering independent, they have yet to make up their minds. This is more optimistic and certainly possible, since none of the debates have even taken place yet.

The other focus of the poll was on registering and obtaining absentee ballots online. One hundred percent of those polled whom were not registered to vote said they were more likely to register if they could do so online. Sixty percent of the total number polled said they were more likely to vote if they could get an absentee ballot online, although 70 percent did not know how to do so.

The good news is that you can both register to vote and get an absentee ballot online. Although most Bucknell students could figure out how to do so after a few minutes of surfing, all you have to do is go to www.voter.com and click on "Register to Vote." This will link you to election.com and you can register or get your absentee ballot. The website generates a letter for you and you print it. It only takes a few minutes. You simply send the letter to the address they give you. Then you'll receive your absentee ballot in the mail and you fill it out and send it in.

Remember you have to send the ballot request letter in at least seven days before the election and the site recommends you do it at least a month ahead of time. The election is November 7th so get online soon to put in your request; you wouldn't want to miss your chance to participate in the next election.

Putin flourishing in new role

By Michael Boland

When Vladimir Putin took over as head of the Russian state on Dec. 31, 1999, the whole world took notice. The selection of an ex-KGB agent as successor to Boris Yeltsin immediately raised eyebrows among international policy-makers. Speculation was rampant: What would happen to the fragile Russian democracy? Would the new president use his experience as a part of the ruthless KGB to lead his country back into authoritarianism? Could he be trusted to respect the freedom of his people? Nine months later, the answers to these questions are still unclear.

Vladimir Putin had served as President Boris Yeltsin's prime minister for only five months before taking over for Yeltsin. Yeltsin stepped down on Jan. 31, 2000, amidst heavy criticism that incompetence and corruption throughout his supposedly democratic government had rendered it incapable of truly serving the struggling Russian people. As prime minister in Yeltsin's cabinet, Putin automatically became acting president, as per the Russian Constitution, for 90 days.

Although Putin was not, at first, directly elected by the Russian people for the office of President, he has since won an election and become a very popular politician. But because he is popular, and he came to power by democratic means, does not necessarily alleviate all Western concerns about a potential slide away from democracy. Several incidents under Putin's watch have produced heavy criticism, and renewed concerns about the future of Russian governance.

Putin has escalated the war in Chechnya, the Russian province that has for years been fighting Moscow for independence. His sometimes brutal tactics have come under fire from European leaders, who insist that claims of human rights abuses by the Russian army in the region must be investigated. Putin's response: "We are categorically opposed to any thesis of human rights being used to try to prevent Russia from bringing order to that territory." Putin has promised to make the situation "more transparent," but his determination to crack down on Chechnya (with considerable support from the Russian people) has done little to ease concerns about Putin's true commitment to human rights and domestic peace.

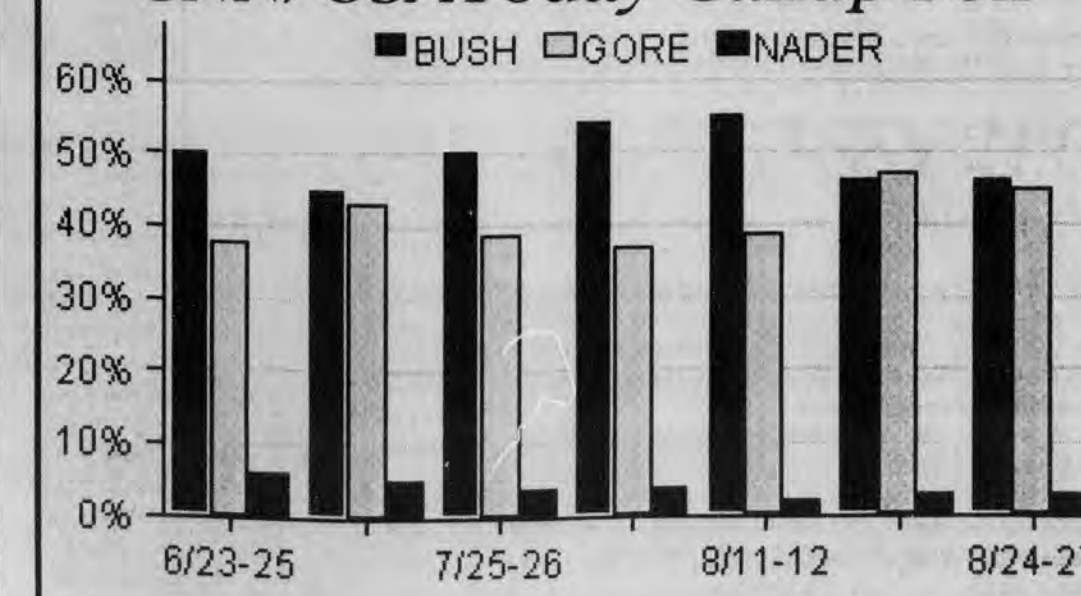

Putin's record with the Russian media has also been suspect. In June, less than three months into his reign as elected president, Putin was criticized for allegedly arranging the arrest of Vladimir Gusinsky, a prominent media mogul and fierce Kremlin critic.

Gusinsky was arrested on charges of embezzlement from the state, held for a brief time, and then released, but not before other Russian dissidents could label the arrest "politically motivated" and accuse Putin of seeking to limit freedom of the press. Putin has also quietly created a "Ministry for Media Issues," taken by some as a sign that the law-and-order-oriented Putin will seek to use state resources to silence dissent, as did dictators in the Soviet era.

The potential danger Putin poses to his people should not, however, be overstated. Mikhail Gorbachev, the Russian leader of the 1980s who is credited for helping to end the Cold War has come to Putin's defense, publicly stating his belief that Putin is no enemy of democracy and will not try to reverse the democratic reforms of post-Communist Russia. Gorbachev was never so generous in his assessments of Boris Yeltsin.

In addition, it is not unreasonable to assume that with the Russian economy in shambles and political corruption so widespread, it is in fact going to take a strong central government, to pull the country together and restore Russia to international prominence. It is not unreasonable to expect that a few years of peace, coupled with economic stability and the development of sturdier political institutions, will make Putin's job much easier and will pave the way for a smoother democracy in Russia. His words, at least, make him seem committed to continued reform and greater freedom for his people.

New faces, welcomed attitudes

During his tenure at the University, former President William D. "Bro" Adams enacted initiatives that greatly affected the student body, including the Capital Campaign, the Ten Point Plan, and the Plan for Diversity. The existence of these and other programs was felt by all students, though Bro's own personal presence was rarely noticed. In fact, a resounding number of students said that they would have no idea who the former president was if they stood face-to-face with him.

Bro's predecessor, Professor Gary Sojka, is still regarded as one of the most visible members of the campus community. Faculty members who taught during Sojka's presidency can't help but draw a connection between his openness and accessibility and that of our new President, Stefan Rogers.

With the arrival of the new president, students have already noticed the distinct differences between Rogers and Adams. Rogers and his wife, Athena, have made concerted efforts to interact with students on all levels, whether it be in the LC or a reception hosted at the President's house.

The president's demanding schedule entails numerous off-campus obligations that may limit his accessibility; therefore, the more accessible dean of students is often viewed as the face of the administration.

Former Dean of Students Richard Chapman won over hordes of students by simply eating dinner in the cafeteria. Students saw him there, saw that he cared and subsequently developed a personal, humanistic image of him as an administrator.

His current successor, new Dean of Students Rick Ferraro, has made similar strides in meeting and conversing with students. Ferraro prefers to hold open office hours to address all student needs and also plans to hold receptions for different student groups.

These efforts give the student body a thorough perspective on the administration, its goals and its feeling towards the students. Seeing these administrators actively pursuing relationships with students gives us all renewed feelings of confidence in our leadership and trust that they would respect and utilize student input to better serve the interests of the whole community.

Visible administrators give students a larger sense of security while dispelling a bureaucratic, behind-the-scenes image that many students believe administrators convey.

The Bucknellian applauds the efforts of these and other administrators who have worked to establish a hands-on relationship with the student body. We urge them to continue making their best efforts in extending these relationships further in the future.

Gain a semester of Greek life

Students should have option to rush during second semester freshman year

By Ryan Delahanty

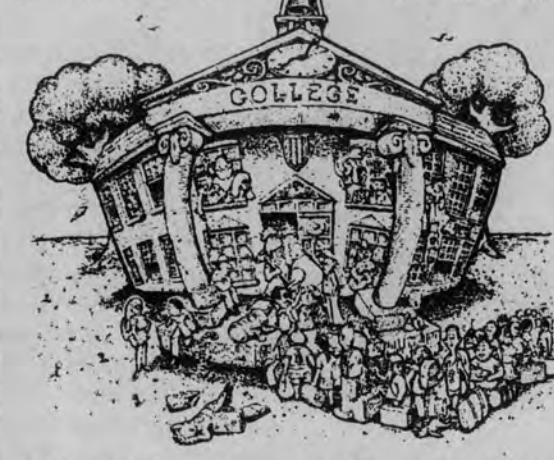

Greek life is a major part of Bucknell's social scene; more than three-fifths of the nearly 4,000 students are involved in either a fraternity, sorority, or a mix of the two. In an environment such as this, laden with a social scene heavily dependent on a Greek society setup, sometimes students can get "lost" in the partying scene.

In order to counteract this, the administration that runs Greek life decided a few years back (before I was here), that it would be a good idea to make students wait until their sophomore year to rush. The logic behind this is that first year students are usually overwhelmed when they come to a new environment, namely college in this situation, so an additional responsibility, such as a fraternity or sorority might hinder the freshmen's ability to perform well academically.

While this is certainly a very real possibility, there is another viable option. Rather than taking a potential year of Greek life away from incoming freshmen, why not allow them to rush their second semester of freshman year? That way they can be brothers or sisters for a full three years, having pledged their second semester.

Having rush delayed until sophomore year would mean more responsibility and commitment than any rushee knows about and you have a pretty busy schedule.

so that students can adjust to the rigors of college life is reasonable. Learning to adapt to a new environment is particularly difficult, more so at a college and at the average age of 18. There is great responsibility; one must learn the delicate art of balancing class and "social activities." Imagine adding to all of this pressure by joining a fraternity or sorority.

which means more responsibility and commitment than any rushee knows about and you have a pretty busy schedule.

However, if the administration could make a second semester freshman rush possible, there would be a myriad of advantages. First, for the people that can balance work and play it's unfair to deny them the opportunity to go Greek during their first year. Secondly, many present Greeks feel as though two and a half years, the present time one can be Greek, is not long enough, especially if a student goes away for a semester abroad. That would mean a "loss" of a semester with one's brothers and sisters, with whom you have formed very close ties. Also, the longer potential affiliation with a Greek organization allows for a more mature Greek body; this means that those who have been in a fraternity or sorority for a while better understand the philanthropic part of Greek life, than someone that is pledging or who has just become a full member.

There are both advantages and disadvantages to both arguments. Waiting until sophomore year to rush allows for the full maturation process of the students and prevents them from potentially ruining their academic careers before they know what hit them. Conversely, a second semester freshman year rush could do the same thing while allowing students the opportunity to be Greek for three and a half years. Many other schools do a freshman second semester rush successfully, so why can't we?

It has been just short of two weeks since I've been back on campus after spending last semester living in Europe, and the readjustment to life at the University is still underway. Honestly, I was more than happy to come back to school after a

Then there are the little daily issues that stem from the fact that I was gone for what seems like a very long time. For example, checking my mail for the first time turned out to be a considerable challenge for me. After spending 10 minutes trying to remember which mailbox, exactly, was mine, I spent the next 20 trying all the possible combinations I could think of. Of course, in the midst of this process I could have easily told you the numbers to open every com-and semi-intelligent answer to the question, "So, how was it being abroad?" My general answer has been "good," but somehow that doesn't seem to encapsulate my experiences last semester. The only way to give justice to my four months in Italy would probably require me to ramble on which few people

Of course, in the midst of this process I could have easily told you the numbers to open every com-ination lock that I have used since elementary school, except the one to my mailbox.

Then there are my classes. One of the perks of studying abroad is that professors generally tend to recognize that students spend a significant amount of time traveling and consider this when assigning homework. While I thoroughly enjoyed this break at the time, I'm now having a wake-up call as my homework is already piling up after only seven days of class. I'm also feeling a little more pressure as I begin this semester as I am no longer working to receive a "pass" as I did on my non-Bucknell program while abroad. Now every grade I receive will appear again after finals.

One last minor observation that I'd like to note is how bizarre it is that, now that I'm back, I'm realizing that I don't recognize about half of the students on campus. This, quite logically, has to do with the shuffle of the senior class moving out and the new first-year students moving in. However, I think I'm more aware of all the changes on campus than I have been in the past.

I think I never really understood that life goes on here whether any of us are here or not.

I realize that I have a fair amount of what seem like complaints about being back. I don't want to convey the message that I have a completely negative outlook on being here, however, I definitely have some adjustments that I'm working through, but overall my return to life at the University has been a pleasant experience. I think that I have a renewed appreciation for all of my friends here given the fact that the majority of us have been separated since December. Then there are those students who I haven't seen since I was a sophomore because they chose to go abroad while I was on campus and vice-versa. I think that the fact that our class is finally reunited will make the senior experience that much better.

I guess my closing message is to encourage everyone to at least consider travelling abroad for a semester. While the transition back to the Bubble may be a little bumpy, it is well worth the range of experiences you'll be left with in the end.

School cures summertime blues

By Kristen Jancuk

As the days remaining in the month of August steadily decreased, I became overwhelmed by a sense of happiness that one is not meant to experience at the end of summer vacation. But, it couldn't be helped. Summer vacation isn't what it used to be (the highlight of my summer was going to a restaurant called Tequila Mockingbird) and I was actually counting down the days until I could come back here.

First of all, Mother Nature seemed to find a sense of humor for herself this summer. How cute. The "summer" weather was anything but. Sunny days were few and far between. It was, for the most part, about 70 degrees and rainy. There were a few days here and there where it reached 90 degrees and was humid and overcast. How refreshing. I think I saw the sun about three times all summer.

The weather didn't matter too much though, since I, and I'm sure most of you, had to be a real person this summer. Working at a snowball stand a few days a week or babysitting the neighbor's kids isn't cutting it anymore. So, I accepted fate and allowed myself to be locked up in a windowless office this summer, filling, photocopying and doing all the other mental tasks that the "big" people were more than happy to throw my way.

While at school every- one seems to be able to party like rock-stars late into Wednesday night and still make it to class Thursday morning, the impending doom of "the office" cut nights short. There's a big difference between sitting through class with a headache and trying to work a full day on three hours sleep without killing the cheery employee in the cubicle next to you who keeps saying "You don't look well, are you coming down with something?" Even- ing outings with friends generally revolved around complaining about work while sitting in some- one's family room watching bad movies.

Everyone was home and in bed by mid- night, perhaps in part because of parents advising "Be home early, you have to work tomorrow," which I've learned ac- tually means "I have to get up early to go to work and I don't want to be up all night waiting for you."

If you actually got to go on vacation, you may have discovered that it's not all it used to be. My friends and I piled into the car for a two-day trip to the beach with great expectations. The beach was beautiful and our sun-starved skin finally picked up some color, mostly pink.

Unfortunately, we spent a great deal of time wondering what hap- pened to all the guys our age, until we realized that they were all work- ing real jobs too. What was left on the beach were some 17-year-olds with bad pick up lines (or none at all, most of them just stared) and one million small children with no parents. Our evening excursion to the boardwalk confirmed that no one over 17 was actually in Ocean City except for us.

So, when it came time to pack up my things and return to Bucknell, I was overjoyed. Think about it. You have your weekends off, and most of your weeknights, you don't have to pay for food and since there's no where to go you don't have to buy gas. You don't have to feel bad about anyone waiting up for you. You can wake up 10 minutes before class and still be there on time and if you are late you're not going to get fired for it. Bucknell is looking, well, pretty good.

College 101: hints for first year students

By David McGreevy

After about a week or so of classes, it seems like Bucknell students are starting to settle into their new rooms, new classes and new routines. There are always a lot of adjustments to make as the semester begins, especially for those starting their very first year of college. It can be a trying time for new students, but often all that is needed is some compassionate advice from their older, more experienced classmates. I thought that I would help the class of 2004 get off on the right foot by sharing a little bit of my accumulated wisdom. You older kids can still read, though. Maybe you'll learn something!

Based on scientific observations of last year's campus tours, I have concluded that the Class of 2004 enjoys walking around in large groups looking at things. To ensure that the newest Bucknellians will have access to the activities they enjoy, I am hereby founding the "Bucknell University Walking Around and Looking at Things Club" (BU-WAALATC). Meetings are at 4:30 p.m. on Thursdays. Hope to see you there.

In your first few weeks on campus, you will be meeting many new people. Often students have a hard time remembering all these new names. To save yourself some effort, you may wish to greet everyone you meet, male or female, as "Cliff."

Often, new students have difficulties adjusting to living in a room with someone they've never met. Usually the best way to deal with these sorts of issues is to discuss them honestly with your roommate and try to form a consensus. Alternately, though, if reason forced to the trans- central are home to many cases of grubs and berries, any of which would make a great supper.

To make some extra space in a cramped dorm room, many students choose to construct a loft for their beds. If carpentry is not your thing, though, why not try digging a small "bunker" in the floor? Shoveling is a lot easier than sawing and pounding nails, plus you and your "roomie" can spend weekends acting out your favorite scenes from "Apocalypse Now."

If, even with lofts and bunkers, you are dis- satisfied with the size of your room, simply apply a sledgehammer to your wall and construct a "suite" with the help of your neighbors. Com- munal living can be fun!

For better or worse, it's a fact: Greek organi- zations tend to dominate the social scene at Bucknell. You don't need to worry too much about fitting in, though. Just wait until after you've pledged to mention that your father is the wicked King Xerxes.

University policies make it clear that first year students are forbidden to keep cars on cam- pus. No such rule exists, however, for the Ar- my's AH-64 Apache Helicopter. You may wish to take advantage of this loophole before the ad- ministration catches on!

Well, I hope these suggestions help you out as you begin your time here at Bucknell. Keep some of the simple tips above in mind, and to- gether we can all make 2000 the greatest year yet!

"Moving on up" proves difficult

By Maureen Fick

By some stroke of unexpected, and believe me when I say infre- quent, good fortune, I lived on the ground floor of my freshman dorm and then in a mod last year, sparing me the ordeal of hauling my belongings up several flights of steps. (Therefore, Aug. 26 stands out as the first time I ever approached that task at Bucknell when I relocated my earthly possessions from my home in Baltimore to the fourth (yes, I did say) fourth floor of Trax. And it was not easy.

Forbidden to pick up my room key until 11 a.m. that day but re- quired to attend a set of meetings beginning at 5 p.m., I was left with a seemingly ample six hours to empty the car and establish some semblance of order with its contents. Showing off my fine maneuvering skills, my dad wedged our bursting Volvo wagon between two other over-loaded SUVs in the parking lot behind the building, positioning the back door as close to the entrance as possible.

This was of course not close enough since several other families were doing the same thing, taking into account the trees and bushes between the door and the opening of the lot. Landscaping is necessary and greenery is a fine addition to any living environment, but accessibility should factor into the plans.

I heaved a box that could have equaled half my body weight to the door and up the winding staircase only to find the heavy door to my hallway closed and unequipped with a door-stop of any kind. Figuring it was time to get creative, and feeling a bit rushed by the sounds of heavy breathing slowly mounting the stairs to my landing, I decided that the ghetto metal chair provided to each of the Trax singles would have to do. It took up most of the doorway and posed as a potential toe-stubber, but it was a quick fix. I shook my head in disgust that such an obvious nicety would be overlooked when

Fourth Sunday choir fills Rooke Chapel with song

Group backs up the Rooke regulars with a new style, increased popularity

By Michelle Payne

From first-year students to alumni, Bucknellians are familiar with the vocal stylings of a cappella groups Two Past Midnight, The Bisons Chips and The Silhouettes, as well as the famed Rooke Chapel Choir and the new Bucknell Jazz Machine. However, the above list does not exhaust all of the choral ensembles that the University has to offer.

The Fourth Sunday Choir, created last fall and ever expanding, offers a unique experience for those students who simply enjoy making music. (There is no other requirement!) This semester, the choir continues to gain a more distinctive profile as the community becomes aware of its presence on campus.

The Choir had humble beginnings. While the Rooke Chapel Choir adds a powerful touch to the services at Rooke, its absence on the fourth Sunday of every month once left a powerful void.

So last fall, University Chaplain Ian Oliver requested the help of student musicians to sing during those Sundays when the Chapel Choir took a well-deserved break. On the fourth Sunday of September 1999, 12 students responded by arriving at chapel an hour before the service to rehearse an anthem, and the Fourth Sunday Choir was born.

In their first semester, only a small group of students met to rehearse; quietly and earnestly, however, they added music to chapel services. Since then, membership has more than tripled to include nearly 50 students.

To accommodate busy schedules, the choir now rehearses in two groups that meet in different time slots. Although the Chapel Choir is not always absent on "fourth Sundays," "Fourth Sunday" name has become a permanent fixture, and the ensemble sings for services three to four times a semester.

With no auditions necessary and all degrees of musical talent welcome, the choir is skills through the choir. Ruth Li '02 is an accomplished pianist who often accompanies rehearsals. There are also occasions when a piece can be enhanced by additional brass, woodwinds or percussion.

Members experiment freely with harmony and music arrangement and often form small instrumental groups that add variety to chapel services.

"The group is really enthusiastic; the choir is a lot of fun," said soprano Ryan Miedel '02. "What's great about it is that you don't have to audition, but you get an amazing sound."

When asked if she could think of anything that the choir needed, Miedel reported concisely, "More boys." A veritable concern: as the Fourth Sunday Choir continues to grow, its large number of sopranos and altos may overpower the tenor and bass singers, half of whom graduated in the spring.

The choir, however, is anything but dwindling in membership; its exponential growth last year seems to be continuing.

As the Fourth Sunday Choir gains in numbers, certain values and characteristics remain intact; they are devoted to music and to one another. With the exception of last year's graduates, all of the choir's founding voices continue to sing together, even as membership, and the sound of voices united in song, soars.

both inviting and enriching to its members. The singers range from former members of high school or church choirs to current members of other University ensembles.

Due to their diversity of talent, the members sing several forms of contemporary Christian music to span their many tastes and ability levels; they have been known to sing everything from revamped camp songs to four-part harmony and a cappella.

Wink Thinks

Dear Wink,
I have had a girlfriend here for the past three years, and I guess you could say that we are pretty committed to one another. To be honest, she is the only girl that I have been with over my years at Bucknell. I can still remember the first day that we met: She was wearing a pair of tight black pants on her way to a party. I was drawn to her like a monkey to bananas, and the rest is history.

We have pretty much been going strong since then, but every once in a while she starts talking about life after college. I totally realize that there is a life after this four-year drunken party that we call college. I think they call it sobriety. However, I am not willing to think that far in advance. In all honesty,

I really only think far enough in the future to decide whether my next case is going to be Natty cans or bottles, so when she starts hinting at marriage, I get really scared. I can't see myself settling down, having a real job and everything like that. White picket fence? I don't think so; I would much rather be greeted with a loud, "Stay off the lawn!"

Basically, I don't know what to do. I really am in love with my girlfriend, but am so scared at the thought of having that much responsibility. It's almost as scary as when you see the empty cup sitting on the top of a keg; you just get chills.

Therefore, I ask you, Wink, What should I do? I am afraid that if she brings it up again and I just ignore it she will think that everything is cool. However, if I do say something she may become really offended. Who knows, maybe even worse! I really don't know the best way to handle this situation. Call me stupid, scared, whatever. I just need help.

Sincerely,
So Long To Skips

Dear So Long To Skips,
Let me just start off by saying that I think that the little black pants have stolen many guys' hearts around this campus. I mean, you really can't go anywhere around here without seeing them. It's not just parties, but in class, in the library, and I have even seen girls wearing them at the gym.

So I guess you probably want to know about this whole marriage thing. Well, I am not married and I don't have a girlfriend, so I am personally not too scared about it, but I can see how you would be. Having someone just come out one day and say, "I want to spend the rest of my life with you" is a pretty big thing. I mean we are talking about years here.

I get tired of some people after talking to them for a minute. I think that the thought of marriage is probably a lot scarier for a guy than it is for a girl. I personally know some people who I wouldn't even give a dog to, let alone see them start a family.

I would definitely try and put things in perspective and take them as they come. While it isn't bad to think of life after college, I think it's wise just to take things one step at a time.

There's no sense in planning for things that should be a while down the road just because you have been dating someone for a couple years. At your age you should be out having fun, not worrying about marriage. You shouldn't even be worrying about marriage until you are 25; before that you simply aren't mentally or emotionally ready for it.

Now it seems the only problem is how to tell your girlfriend. I don't think you should ignore something that she says, especially something as important as a long-term commitment.

Just tell her how you feel; she has to understand. I mean it's not like she can say, "No, you have to marry me now." If she did, she is probably so cracked out that you shouldn't be with her in the first place.

Just tell her how it is and what I told you and you should be fine. Take it step by step. That is the best advice that I could give to anyone. You only live once, so you might as well make it as fun as possible. Just take it easy and play it cool.

In conclusion, I just would like to say that I don't want to see anyone getting married while they are still in college, or else I'll refuse to come to your wedding. Additionally, there are a lot of things you can only learn with time. People change, situations change and there is still a lot of life left.

As Blunk 182 says, "with many years ahead to fall in line, why would you wish that on me? What's my age again? What's my age again?" Until next time, in the words of my good friend Adam Carolla, all I have to say is, "Good Times!"

Gerdes administers with a personal touch

By Katie Hays

It's true—undergraduates of certain institutions view the University administration like "Big Brother"—an entity with the complex inner workings of a super computer and the empathy to match. In such institutions, the "personalized education" (the type in which professors and administrators focus upon the individual's intellectual development) seems to have decayed. Idealists are transformed into cynics.

However, such cynicism, apathy and distance seem lesser at the University, and it is individuals like Interim Vice President for Academic Affairs Eugenia "Genie" Gerdes that alter our paradigms.

An hour shared with Dr. Gerdes reveals an administrative leader as interested in her students as other professors and scholars of psychology. Gerdes' experience as a professor, parent and scholar sculpts her attitude towards learning and learning. Popular student ideas of a distant administration do not apply to the administration of which Gerdes is currently a major part.

Gerdes occupies a quiet office in Marts Hall where she meets with both deans and students regarding everything from academic policy to program requirements. Her job description includes overseeing 34 academic departments and programs in the Colleges of Arts and Sciences and Engineering, serving a total of 3,250 students, certainly sounds imposing.

Gerdes, however, speaks enthusiastically of her administrative role. "This position allows me to help students optimize this once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to develop intellectually. The attitude of the faculty towards the value of this opportunity can play a pivotal role in the lives of students, and I work with that faculty."

As an administrator, Gerdes helped to devise the idea for first-year foundation seminars as a key to building close relationships between faculty and new students; the seminars provide close interactions, small groups and intimate discussions.

Gerdes assumed the role of interim vice president after serving as dean of the College of Arts and Sciences since 1990; her experience in such a role helps in her new duties. "Since we have a new president and a large turnover in administration, it's important for everyone to keep things moving forward without any backsliding caused by the transition," she said. "I think that the backgrounds of the academic administration here aid us to overcome this challenge; we are already familiarized with the University's programs and policies."

Gerdes excels at working with both detail and "the big picture" and her interweaving of such abilities creates her strength as a leader. Since she made the transition from professor to dean in the late 1980s, Gerdes has taught occasionally (including last year for Nancy Weida's capstone seminar "Working Women"), and in so doing has retained her direct involvement with individual students.

From noon until 4pm, Bucknell students were invited to roam the streets of Lewisburg and explore the many interesting shops and restaurants which contribute to the character of their new home at Bucknell. This gave Bucknellians the chance to familiarize themselves with the community in which they will be living for the next nine months.

Throughout the afternoon, Bucknell students could be seen strolling along Market Street in pairs and packs. They peered into shop windows in search of the orange signs proclaiming "Lewisburg Loves Bucknell" and entered stores to experience the refreshing air-conditioning.

Shop owners easily recognized students before the presentation of a student ID by the bright red backpacks promoting VarsityBooks.com (serving as a useful carry-all for the many promotional gifts offered by the vendors).

Moreover, they graciously welcomed all into their businesses with smiles and well wishes for the upcoming academic year.

Many shops were well prepared to provide many of the important but often overlooked items students may have left at home. W.L. Donehower Sports offered Converse shower slides at a discounted price, while Coles Hardware gave away sets of clothes hangers.

On one might initially assume that Gerdes, after emerging from college with a strong personal interest in both academia and in individual students, would find her administrative duties a bit banal. Sitting in her office, she treasures the time that she spends with her family. "We travel, which helps us to relieve stress and to pay greater attention to one another. Our favorite place to visit is probably Italy," Gerdes' son is currently attending Brown and her daughter is a senior in high school. Her husband, John, works as a psychologist in the Geisinger Health System.

After discussing psychology, leadership, family and her new place as interim vice president, Gerdes leans back in her chair and allows visitors to examine the bookshelf behind her desk. Besides all the books, a soft black and white photograph of a young man stands alongside a tall hourglass.

The latter two items coincide with what we know of Gerdes; they are visible reminders of her value of time, education and thought. However, the old photograph eludes any obvious explanation. When questioned, Gerdes pauses to look at the photo; she smiles as she explains, "That's my college advisor. He's much older now but the picture reminds me of when I was a college student. I admired his patience; at one point, I couldn't get a copy of the assigned reading for one of his classes, so I went to his office and asked him if I could borrow his copy of it."

Gerdes shakes her head at the college version of herself. "He handed me his personal copy of the text. The faculty at my university cared about its students and attended to their interests; seeing that photograph helps me to identify still more strongly with the students with whom I am working as an administrator."

Students and student growth, most obviously, concern Gerdes. In relation to her mode of creating new policies, Gerdes said, "The most helpful way to devise a plan of action in relation to policy is to ask, 'What is best for the students?'"

That which is best for students will enrich their lives by allowing them the greatest opportunity for a quality experience with faculty, and will also work to further the academic progress of the institution as a whole.

Gerdes, ever concerned with the whole and each of its functioning parts, has lived a life that defies labels. A relatively recent addition to her many scholarly articles, "Remembering the Contemporary Life," reminds one of her attitude towards working and living. As she sits behind her desk next to the prism that dangles from her desk lamp, we are reminded that Gerdes is a thinker who struggles to hold "the light" for the University.

"It's worthwhile to work in any profession that involves education," she said. "When we see the light turn on, whether in enthusiastic faculty members or in our eager students, we want to continue to educate. We constantly work to improve these institutions of education. And in so doing, we learn."

Genie Gerdes should continue as a "prism" within our administration, gathering and attracting the light of others and directing it towards learning, achievement and progress for some time to come.

Lewisburg Day gives newcomers a taste of hospitality

By Sandi Jo Galati and Sarah Gudenkauf

Although the University no longer bears the name of the surrounding area, it is quite obvious that Lewisburg still takes great pride in Bucknell. Citizens and business owners recently displayed their appreciation of the student population on Monday, August 28, as they hosted Lewisburg Day, celebrating the return of all Bucknellians.

From noon until 4pm, Bucknell students were invited to roam the streets of Lewisburg and explore the many interesting shops and restaurants which contribute to the character of their new home at Bucknell. Student fashion designer brings her work to campus

Natalie Sopic '01 will present her own line of fashion to the University at a runway show this upcoming October

By Meghan Magee

Senior Natalie Sopic brings an exciting line of her own fashion designs to campus this October when she presents her Senior project consisting of her own designs. After creating her own major, design management, Sopic spent countless hours successfully creating 10 couture style pieces.

Sopic calls her line Urban Millennium, which is derived from her upbringing in the urban environment of New York City, inarguably a fashion capital. Sopic sums up her line as "a unified body and spirit in a diverse environment." Inspired by the difficulty of standing out in an urban environment, Sopic considers a person's spirituality the key to maintaining individuality. The Asian spiritual look of Sopic's pieces confirms the idea behind the line including the futuristic fabrics that seem to represent the millennium aspect and modernity.

Receiving approval for her major at the University was one of the easier challenges Sopic faced throughout this venture. In order to go through with her plan, Sopic approached many individuals and organizations with her ideas to receive funding. A majority of her support came from the Association for the Arts, and she also appreciates the generous contributions from the Deans, the Panhellenic

Natalie Sopic has not only fashioned her own line of clothing, but her own major, design management. She will be displaying her 10 style pieces via a fashion show this October. Her line is called Urban Millennium and was fabricated this past summer at her house in New York City.

Council and the Residential Colleges.

The model search for the fashion show followed the fundraising. Last March, Sopic chose 10 University women to model her pieces with the original theme of urban diversity in mind.

Sopic pictured a group of women who represented different ethnicity and had diverse looks. The model's measurements allowed Sopic to custom design each piece for the particular model.

Designing the actual pieces came next, which Sopic undertook at home in New York City over the summer. After purchasing all of the fabrics and completing the designs, fellow student Lauren Rudick introduced Sopic to Rena Kile. Kile became Sopic's partner in the project, essentially using her talents to bring Sopic's ideas to life. Kile draped Sopic's fabrics over a simple body form to create easy pieces. Sopic admired Kile and her ability to understand the ideas behind Urban Millennium.

Halfway through the summer Sopic received a visit from adsor Paula Davis-Larson of the theatre and dance department. Davis-Larson traveled to Manhattan to ensure that the project was well on its way. Thankful for the dedication of her advisor, Sopic quickly admits her support was instrumental in the development of the Urban Millennium line.

Sopic additionally expresses her thanks to the heads of production who continue to organize the runway event that takes place in October. Keep a watch out for the work of visiting dance professor Simone Ferro from Brazil. Ferro volunteered to choreograph the runway show and choose appropriate music for the themed line.

Sopic collaborated with the Northumberland Housing Authority to make her project a community service endeavor as well. Although there is no admission fee for the runway show, the suggested donation is three dollars, which will help to provide housing and find jobs for low-income families.

Everyone is invited to see the fruits of Sopic's creativity, persistence and fashion flair on October 14th in Smith quad (time to be determined) followed by a reception in the Vedder lobby. The artistic talents of Natalie Sopic are not to be missed, so come witness her brilliant creations and don't forget donations for the Northumberland Housing Authority.

Summer sizzled as laughter, action and drama hit theaters

With mostly winners on the silver screen, theater enthusiasts flocked to see the summer's hottest flicks.

By Alex Costos

Whether you are into comedy, action, drama, or horror movies, this summer's box office was sizzling. Comic movies such as Road Trip, "Me, Myself & Irene," "Space Cowboys" and "Scary Movie" bounced into theaters with laughter while movies such as Hollow Man and "What Lies Beneath" brought a hint of fear into each and every seat. "Gone in 60 Seconds," "X-Men," and "Mission: Impossible 2" brought car chases, explosions, machine guns and sexy apparel for those action movie buffs. Drama had a little more weight to it with movies like "Where the Heart Is," "The Patriot," "Coyote Ugly," "Gladiator" and "Here On Earth." The summer had more ups than downs, but with "The Cell" and "Battlefield Earth" on the agenda, there were disappointments.

COMEDY
Tom Green and Breckin Meyer star in "Road Trip." Four college guys trek across the country to intercept an x-rated home-made movie from getting into the wrong hands. These four scrawny white guys have many perils along the way, such as blowing up their car, stealing a bus from a blind school and sneaking into an all black fraternity. All the while, Tom Green is back on the college campus trying to get a boa constrictor to eat a small white mouse. The movie, hilariously funny with huge leopard-print underwear, nerdy hotel clerks, and Tom Green's attempt to swallow a mouse, guarantees laughs throughout the theater.

"Dumb and Dumber" Farrelly Brothers are at it once again in "Me, Myself & Irene." Jim Carrey stars as an unbalanced Providence, R.I. State Trooper while Rene Zellweger stars as Irene, the criminally involved woman that the multiple personality Carrey falls in love with. In my opinion, "Me, Myself & Irene" was the funniest movie of the summer! Carrey's ability to distort and bend his rubber face supplies many laughs. Carrey's multiple personalities are complete opposites in that one is an uptight, law-abiding State Trooper while the other is a stubborn, bend the rules, and kick everyone's ass cop. Carrey provides constant laughter and Zellweger provides constant good looks. A must see!

Clint Eastwood directs and stars in "Space Cowboys." Tommy Lee Jones, James Garner, Donald Sutherland, and Eastwood star as retired NASA astronauts that never made it into space. Eastwood must round up a team to go into space to stop a Russian satellite armed with multiple nuclear missiles from crashing into Earth. Eastwood quickly adds Jones, Sutherland and Garner to his list of eligible astronauts, all of whom are over 65 years old! Eastwood creates a satire on old age and challenges people of younger generations to compete against him. The old men are quite entertaining and offer tons of laughs.

Any movie directed by Keenan Ivory Wayans is guaranteed to be funny. "Scary Movie" hit the theatres in July as a spoof of several different scary movies. "Scream," "The Sixth Sense," "I Know What You Did Last Summer" and "The Usual Suspects" were among the movies to be parodied. With guest appearances by Li'l Kim, Shawn and Marlon Wayans and Carmen Electra, the movie was as sexy as it was funny. The movie is one to see the stage for spoof comedies and will no doubt be remembered for decades to come.

HORROR/SUSPENSE

"What Lies Beneath" is more suspenseful than it is horrific. Harrison Ford plays an unexpected role that makes the movie all the scarier. Michelle Pfeiffer plays Ford's wife that sees apparitions of dead, attractive, young females. She hears voices and sees doors slamming. Now for all you males out there, this is a perfect movie to see with a girl. The suspense keeps both of you on the edge of your seat wondering what will happen next. Also, Pfeiffer struts her stuff beautifully (which will calm you down even if you do get a little scared). As for all you girls out there, go see it with your man, because it is too terrifying to see it without him. You'll want that arm to clench to 10 minutes into the movie. A definite must see!

If you want hot actors, you can't get any hotter than Elizabeth Shue and Kevin Bacon in "Hollow Man." Bacon and Shue are part of a group of scientists who develop a formula to turn something invisible. Bacon and Shue are involved romantically when Shue dumps Bacon. For another, more clean-cut, straightedge scientist (Josh Brolin), Bacon goes nuts, turns himself invisible and plots to kill both Shue and Brolin. The plot is fairly weak, but the special effects are the best the new century has yet to produce.

Nicolas Cage is back again making action films in "Gone in 60 Seconds." After his brother gets into trouble with a car-jacking kingly, Cage must steal one hundred cars in less than 24 hours. The car wrecks are incredible and Angelina Jolie is sexier than ever. Mustangs, Lamborghini's, Ferraris, and SUV's infect the screen in this dynamic action movie. If high-speed car chases in forward and reverse are your style, then "Gone in 60 Seconds" will be a movie never forgotten.

Tom Cruise has another impossible mission to conquer in "Mission: Impossible 2." The plot is a little weaker than the first "Mission: Impossible," but the action sequences are far more dramatic and far find a suitable man. Expect a storybook ending.

FREEEEEEEDOM!!! were the last words we heard Mel Gibson screaming once before. Now it is more like RIP-OFFFFFF!!!! Don't get me wrong, "The Patriot" is an excellent movie, but as Bucknell's Frank Brugge puts it, "It's an American version of Braveheart." That is, but there are several differences. "The Patriot" provides a lot more laughs and Gibson does not direct the movie. In "The Patriot," Gibson plays a local farmer who is forced to fight the Red Coats because of the kidnapping of one son and the death of another. Gibson just wants a little peace in his life... Why can't he ever get that? Well, "Braveheart," I mean, "The Patriot" is a good movie with great special effects and a really good storyline.

"Coyote Ugly" brings new actors to the big screen. John Goodman and Tyra Banks are some of the known, but Piper Perabo and Maria Bello are some of the unknown. Perabo is a New Jersey girl, with father Goodman, who finds herself on a trek to New York City to find a gig as a songwriter. Perabo finds Coyote Ugly, a girl-run bar in the middle of New York City. Bello, the owner of Coyote Ugly, offers Perabo a job slinging liquor and serving shots. If you are into girls in skimpy clothing and dancing on bars, "Coyote Ugly" is a movie for you!

Ridley Scott brought "Alien" into the world, now it is time for "Gladiator." Russell Crowe is Maximus, a Roman General fighting the Goth Barbarians when he discovers that Commodus (Joaquin Phoenix) is plotting to kill the emperor of Rome, Marcus Aurelius (Richard Harris). Maximus is sentenced to death, escapes, and is forced to be a gladiator. Maximus is determined to have his revenge on Commodus and valiantly fights his way into the Colosseum. Maximus finishes the movie with great valor, not to give away the ending, and becomes a hero. An excellent film and the suspense were all present this summer and it can only get better from here.

Another Chick Flick! In "Here On Earth," Leelee Sobieski plays a small town girl involved in a long-term relationship with actor Josh Hartnett. Things become complicated when prep-school boy, actor Chris Klein, is forced by a judge to work in Sobieski's small town because of a reckless driving incident. Sobieski falls in love with Klein and sparks a jealousy between Hartnett and Klein. The movie is a real tearjerker, with a surprise ending and several heart-felt speeches by Hartnett, Klein, and Sobieski. If romance is what you are looking for, then "Here On Earth" is definitely the movie to see.

DOWNERS
Jennifer Lopez drops her singing career to pick up "The Cell." This edge-of-your-seat thriller is based on futuristic abilities to enter the mind of an unconscious person and interact with that person in his or her world. Vince Vaughn stars as an FBI agent trying to catch star Vincent D'Onofrio who is a serial killer. D'Onofrio locks his victims in a shower stall surrounded by plexiglass then turns on the shower and lets his victims drown. D'Onofrio becomes unconscious and Lopez must find out where he has hidden the last victim. Lopez's acting was scarier than the movie. D'Onofrio did an excellent job acting, as usual, but Vaughn did not fulfill his role at all.

In L. Ron Hubbard's "Battlefield Earth," John Travolta is Teri, the leader of the Psychos. Now you tell me... does this sound interesting? Ok, maybe, but how about this: Teri is eight feet, nine inches tall and is stuck on Earth in the year 3000 something to watch over the human race and keep them in line. Did I mention that John Travolta has three-foot dreadlocks for hair? Well, the special effects were decent and Travolta did a good job acting as the Psychos leader on Earth, but the movie just did not hit the spot for me.

The summer of 2000 definitely had more ups than it did downs. "What Lies Beneath" and "Gladiator" are without hesitation must see movies, while "The Cell" and "Battlefield Earth" can be left off the list of movies to see. Some of these blockbuster hits will unquestionably be remembered for years to come. With Tom Cruise, Jim Carrey, Nicolas Cage, Clint Eastwood, Russell Crowe, Dennis Quaid, Mel Gibson, Harrison Ford, Kevin Bacon, Michele Pfeiffer, Tyra Banks and Jennifer Lopez on screen, the summer was searing with hot actors and actresses and no doubt that they will be back for more next summer. The action, the comedy, the drama, and the suspense were all present this summer and it can only get better from here.

Second Weis building set to open

The new music building will be open in October, replacing a building over 100 years old

By Jenny Johnson

For those of you who have not already noticed, there is a new addition to the University's campus. The Sigfried Weis Music Building, located adjacent to the Weis Center for Performing Arts, is ready for use by students and faculty of Bucknell-well, almost ready. Three members of the music department have moved into the new building, while the rest of the staff plan to move in during fall break. In addition, the recital hall designed for solo and chamber music performances has yet to be completed. Despite these setbacks, the general sentiment of faculty and students regarding the new building is one of joy.

This new state-of-the-art facility includes practice rooms, an electronic music studio, percussion studio, classrooms, a music library with computer stations and listening carrels and a seven-station keyboard computer lab. Symphonic Band Director William Kenny said, "The new building is an exceptional facility. The new keyboard lab will put Bucknell University on the

seem to appreciate the new building yet have some reservation of making it their new home. "We spent so much time in the old practice rooms that the old Music and Art building really felt like our home. I used to know which rooms all of my friends would be in but being in the new building is so different," says Senior Music Education major Renee Brody. "Don't get me wrong though. The new building has great pianos and a basement that won't flood which is a definite plus." Hopefully with the movement of the remaining music professors from the old to the new building, the old sense of family will be regained in the new building. Sentiments of students are a little more mixed. Overall, students

RA lead skit presents sex issues to new students

The Choices and Challenges program informs and entertains first-year students

By Natalie Casp

Unsuspecting first year students gathered in the Harvey Powers Theatre in Coleman Hall for the RA's rendition of "Love- lines" Tuesday evening.

In two performances, RAs, along with Associate Dean of Arts and Sciences Robert Midkiff, Jim Wiltgen, program coordinator of the residential colleges, and Janice Butler, director of the women's resource center, hosted an entertaining and educational skit about sex, alcohol and college relationships.

The play, Sex @ 7, boasts humorous exchanges between drunken upperclassmen at the year's first party.

Before long, the laughter fades and uncomfortable situations emerge. Each character summarizes their situation in asides addressed to the audience of first year students.

"It's a different way to reach my first year residents, especially when they get to see me, their RA, make a fool out of myself,"

- Meredith Gill '03

All of the RAs who acted in the play did so willingly. "It's important information that the first year students need to know and this program is more effective than administrators just sitting them down and telling them," said Donna Brennan '02.

The entertainment factor, according to Meredith Gill '03, increased her residents' attendance at the program.

"It's a different way to reach my first year residents, especially when they get to see me, their RA, make a fool of myself," Gill said.

Almost on a daily basis, RAs address issues of alcohol, sex and college relationships with their residents. Acting out a play of what to do and what not to do helps the students learn about the resources here on campus.

Second-time RA Hilary Trought '01 commented on her choice to play a naïve freshman at her first party. "My character stands up for herself and doesn't give in to college pressures."

I hope the first year students out there understand that it's ok to say no to uncomfortable situations."

New faces head College of Engineering

Deans Orbison and Marosi anxious to fill void as leaders, administrators in Engineering Department

Paige Cull—The Bucknellian

Jim Orbison, a faculty member in the civil engineering department since 1982, accepted a two-year role as Interim Dean of Engineering.

Interim Dean Orbison prepares for new administrative position

By Matt Albert

Few members of the University community have experienced great success on both sides of the chalkboard. New Interim Dean of Engineering Jim Orbison has his name among this small group of gifted individuals.

His new role as interim dean is the latest addition to his University career, which includes a bachelor's degree in civil engineering in 1975 and a faculty position in the civil engineering department which he took in 1982. "My affiliation and loyalties to Bucknell go back a long, long time," he said.

Orbison is filling the dean of engineering position vacated this past year by former Dean Humphrey, who has continued his career as the chair of the department of mechanical and aerospace engineering at the University of Virginia.

Though some time has passed since his undergraduate work at the University, Orbison realizes a connection between the two time periods: "I can talk to students and see similarities between what I saw as a freshman and the present, and and what qualities a graduate should possess. In years prior, the Board abided by a "bean counting" policy which listed a definite schedule of classes that each graduate must take for a university to be accredited. Now that policy has changed to an assessment process in which each university can define what it feels are important qualities in their graduates.

The Accreditation Board may still add to a university's list, but no longer dictates the exact schedule of each student. This change will force the College of Engineering to perform a great deal of research in its seniors and alumni to identify weaknesses in any and all areas of study. "We must assess our graduates in each one of those areas and be able to show that we are using that feedback to improve our programs," Orbison said. "If a weakness is found, the University must change to eliminate it, usually by way of an alteration of the curriculum."

Orbison will also aid in the recruitment of new faculty and the planning of curricula, but remains optimistic that these issues will continue to be resolved. "We [the University] need leadership here that is willing to help people do the very best that they can without trying to twist or steer things in directions that might be ultimately counterproductive," he said. "We need to be ready to take advantage of opportunities for the College."

Because of the demands of his new position, Orbison will not be teaching in the civil engineering department during his time in office. "I love teaching, but I'm convinced that I couldn't teach and do this job properly. If I'm going to teach, I'm going to do it right," he said. "When asked if he could see himself continuing as dean beyond the next two years, he remained uncertain: "I have to convince myself that I'm doing a good job and being a positive influence for the College and that I personally enjoy doing this. But I don't have any of the answers to those questions yet."

Ultimately, Interim Dean Orbison is looking forward to the next two years and is very proud to remain at the same place his college career began. "This is an awesome college. There is no real crisis here, and nothing really needs to be fixed," Orbison said. "We have a fabulous faculty, fabulous staff, fabulous students. I'm going to spend my next two years helping to keep it good and whenever possible make it better. That's the way I am."

Associate Dean Marosi steps up from civil engineering department

By Matthew Trunnell

When Dr. Karen Marosi came to the University last fall as a Visiting Assistant Professor of Civil Engineering, she did not plan on switching careers. But when the Associate Dean of Engineering position became vacant, Marosi saw an opportunity.

Dr. Trudy Cunningham previously filled the position. When an engineering student had a problem, whether personal or academic, Trudy was the first person to talk to. No matter how large the problem, Dean Cunningham always had great advice.

By all accounts, whoever was going to fill Trudy's shoes had quite a hill to climb. In the spring of this year, Marosi applied and was selected from a pool of applicants from across the nation.

Marosi plans on fulfilling all of the student-oriented functions that Trudy did—and then some.

"I plan to keep up the quality of service to the students—that is my core mission. But I would also like to fulfill the title of Associate Dean in seeing more administrative duties come to this side of the office," Marosi said.

Some of these new duties include working with the Accreditation Board of Engineering and Technology (ABET). This is the organization that certifies the curriculum in a given major, so that electrical engineers from different universities, for example, have had similar coursework. All of the Universities' engineering disciplines are ABET certified. Keeping that certification in the upcoming review year will be very time consuming, Marosi said.

"One of my biggest challenges right now is learning to be an administrator, learning all of the ins and outs of the curriculum," Marosi said.

The new associate dean is also looking forward to working closely with her counterpart, the new Interim Dean of Engineering, Jim Orbison.

"The two offices have been very separate up to this point, very distinct and non-communicating," Marosi said. "I would like to see much more interaction. Dean Orbison and I worked very well together last year, and I am sure that will continue through the next two years that he is interim dean."

Dean Orbison and Dean Marosi both taught in the civil engineering department last year.

"I love to teach. One of my favorite places is in the classroom working with students, and that is one of the things that drew me to Bucknell," she said. Marosi's undergraduate experience was very similar to the experience at this University. She attended Lafayette College in Easton, Penn.

"At Lafayette, the engineering building was named Dana and the science building was named Olin," Marosi said.

After graduating from Lafayette College, Marosi received her graduate degree from the Pennsylvania State University in State College, Penn. In August of 1999, she received her doctorate from the same institution.

At Penn State, Marosi taught in the civil engineering department. After coming to the University last fall, she taught several courses in materials, mechanics, and soil mechanics—the last of which is her research interest.

The move to an administrative position was unexpected but welcome. Marosi enjoyed her research and feels that it is an integral part of being an instructor, but interacting with people is what she feels she does best.

Improving the College's relations with the Admissions Office and increasing the availability of advising are among Dean Marosi's long term goals—a shift from the traditional role of associate dean.

"This has been a very student-focused office, and it will continue to be very student-focused, but I'd also like to diversify the activities of this office," Marosi said.

Adamant about providing a high level of support to students, Marosi is determined to help engineering students in any way she can—continuing the legacy that Trudy left behind.

"I hope people see this as an open office," Marosi said. "I would also like to meet with all the student societies in the College of Engineering to start to forge some relationships there."

It was only seven years ago that Marosi was an undergraduate student. Her relatively young age should help in identifying with students.

Marosi has few other ideas for improving the undergraduate engineering experience. An Engineering Week in the spring is one such event that may be revived from past years.

"Engineering Week would not be something that takes up a lot of time—students have enough to do already—but instead something that's enjoyable," Marosi said. "I'm very open to student suggestions."

Will global warming cause diseases to surge?

By Katherine Nowak

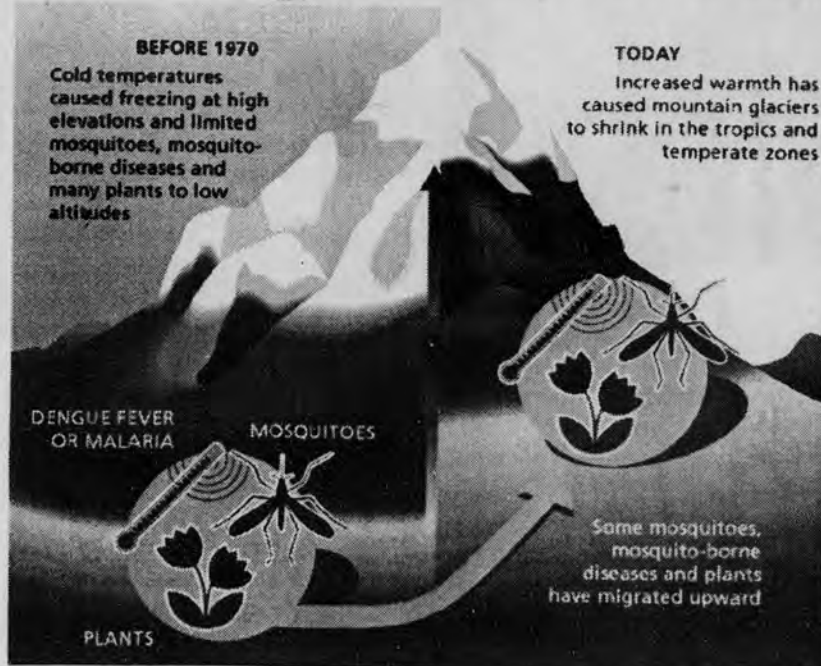

The control of infectious diseases may become an even greater challenge as weather patterns throughout the world continue to shift. Computerized climate models forecast the spread of global warming through the troposphere, the undermost ten kilometers of the atmosphere, raising temperatures worldwide. According to the Sept. 5, 2000, issue of Scientific American, these changes "will expand the incidence and distribution of many serious medical disorders." This prediction is already proving to be true.

The most vulnerable regions are those of the developing world, where erratic weather rhythms have prolonged droughts in arid areas and intensified spurts of precipitation. This severe weather makes crops susceptible to pest infestation, reducing food resources and displacing human populations. Diseases are connected to the resulting crowded conditions. Treatment and prevention is scarce in such countries, but attacks on advanced nations, made accessible through commerce and travel, could increase rapidly. If the environment is suitable for a pathogen or disease-carrying agent, reports Scientific American, the potential spread of infectious disease applies to many parts of the world.

Malaria, for example, which has a transmission area containing 45 percent of the world, could eventually infect 60 percent of the world due to ongoing warming. Outbreaks of malaria have already been recorded during hot spells repeatedly in California, as well as in Texas, Florida, Georgia, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, and Toronto.

Scientific American also reports the recent spread of dengue fever, a disease originally confined to tropic and subtropical regions, to the Americas and northern Australia. Dengue is transmitted by mosquitoes, most commonly Aedes aegypti, and causes sudden onsets of high fever, up to 105 degrees Fahrenheit, accompanied by headaches, joint and muscle pain, and most severely, internal bleeding and death. No treatment is yet available.

While global warming, says Scientific American, is a factor in both malaria and dengue fever spread, so are other human-induced influences. These include environmental destruction and intrusion into once unexplored areas. Viruses which otherwise would not have been encountered by humans arise as forests are urbanized. Those that remain undiscovered often exist in symbiosis with non-human organisms.

Global warming alone provides larger breeding grounds for viruses previously confined to the tropics. Many vectors of diseases, animals or insects that transmit viruses by biting their victim, prefer warmer climates. The Anopheles mosquito, a transmitter of some malaria strains, can lead to outbreaks only in regions where temperatures typically exceed 60 degrees Fahrenheit. Likewise, the vector responsible for yellow fever and dengue fever, the Aedes aegypti mosquito, can transmit viruses in areas where temperatures do not fall below 50 degrees Fahrenheit, reports Scientific American. Illness could be spread to areas that were previously vector-free and where local inhabitants have developed no defenses for mosquito-transferred diseases. As areas warm worldwide, mosquito territories expand.

In addition to increased land range for mosquitoes, there is an increase in mosquitoes present at higher elevations. Certain diseases, once confined to swampy, tropical lowlands, are climbing their way into the world's highlands as summit glaciers melt and temperatures in the highlands rise. Insect-borne infections have been documented at high altitudes in Asia, South and Central America, and East and Central Africa. Within twenty years, the Aedes aegypti has expanded its range to areas above one mile in altitude in the northern highlands of India and to areas 1.3 miles high in the Colombian Andes.

Global warming also disrupts predator-prey relationships. One example is that of a disease-spreading species of mosquito, the Culex pipiens, which can harbor and transmit St. Louis encephalitis. A predator of this mosquito is the dragonfly. Both insects, as other larval insects, require a specific temperature and number of days to mature. Global warming can give mosquitoes a reproductive edge over dragonflies by raising temperatures by as little 1 degree Celsius.

Other disease-transmitting animals, such as rodents, find opportunity with global warming. In the Southwest United States in 1993, drought with sporadic rains brought on episodes of hantavirus pulmonary syndrome, a deadly infection of the lungs. After droughts killed off many of the rodents' predators, including large raptors such as hawks and owls, coyotes, and snakes, heavy rains provided a surplus of food for the rats such as pinon nuts and grasshoppers. The rodent population explosion caused the hantavirus outbreak when drought hit again and rats scurried into human-inhabited regions in search for food.

The increase in radiation due to the degradation of the earth's protective upper zone is also tied to disease surge. With sunrays penetrating more easily, human exposure to the sun becomes more dangerous. Exposure to ultraviolet radiation has been shown to lower numbers of immune system cells. Lowered immunity means greater susceptibility to emerging viruses and less stamina to fight infection.

Most recently, the West Nile virus was carried into the United States by an unknown host. It survived this past mild winter and erupted in the spring of 2000 in New York City. CNN said that the virus had never been seen in the Western Hemisphere. Ecosystem upheaval is thus nearing closer and closer to home.

Bucknell—President's Cup three-peat

Bison women capture women's championship, men finish second to lead Bucknell to unprecedented seventh overall title

By Brooke Rea

Bucknell has once again earned its place at the top of Patriot League athletics.

By winning the coveted President's Cup for the year 2000, Bucknell has become the only institution to win the award three years in a row and has now won seven out of the ten years the award has been in existence. The President's Cup is awarded to the school that accumulates the most points over the course of one academic year; points are awarded based upon tournament finishes by each institution. Bucknell was granted the honor after finishing third or higher in 12 out of the league's 22 sports.

Not only did Bucknell receive the overall award this year, but the Bison women nabbed the championship trophy for the third consecutive year and sixth overall. The women scored 51.5 points with championships in three sports and second-place finishes in three more. Coming in behind the Orange and Blue were Colgate with 45.5 points and Army with 43.

The men earned second place in their side of the trophy contest with a close 48.5 point finish to Army's trophy-winning 51 point finish. The 2000 men's trophy was Army's seventh in 10 years.

By consistently finishing in the top three, Bucknell athletic teams have maintained a tradition of excellence since the founding of the Patriot League. "Bucknell has once again shown that its Athletic Department has an extremely balanced program," said Director of Sports Information Todd Newcomb. "We may not win every championship, but our programs are extremely competitive from top to bottom, and that's what makes Bucknell athletics a success."

This year the Bison's first place finish in the race for the cup was aided by titles in men's and women's cross country, women's indoor and outdoor track & field and a shared men's lacrosse title. Bison teams also finished second in field hockey, men's indoor and outdoor track & field, women's basketball, and golf. Army finished second in the overall race with 94 points to Bucknell's 100, and Colgate came in third with 85.5.

Athletic Director John Hardt is proud of the accomplishment and what it adds to Bucknell's already impressive stature as an academic institution. "This athletic accomplishment is a great compliment to Bucknell's annual ranking as one of the premier NCAA Division-I schools in the country with regard to student-athlete graduation rates," he said. "We annually lead the Patriot League in the numbers of League Scholar-Athletes, Honor Roll Student-Athletes and Academic All-Americans we produce."

"This year's President's Cup is a testament to the dedication and hard work of each and every one of our student-athletes, coaches and athletics staff members at Bucknell," Hardt said.

Previously, Bucknell has won the President's Cup in 1991, '92, '93, '96, '98, and '99. Army has won the cup the three years that Bucknell has not. The Orange and Blue have won the women's trophy for the last three years, as well as in 1993, '95 and '96. In 1993 the women won by an impressive ten points and generally owe their success to the strength of their cross country, indoor and outdoor track & field, and basketball teams. The President's Cup victory means higher prestige and expectations for Bucknell athletics, says Newcomb.

The great success we've had in the Patriot League is a tremendous help in the battle we wage on the recruiting front. Bucknell's ability to balance top-notch academic standards with a successful athletic program sets it apart from other Division-I institutions."

Hardt agreed, and couldn't be happier with the continued success of Bison teams. "The fact that Bucknell has taken this prestigious honor seven times in the ten years that the President's Cup has been awarded for overall program excellence is a tribute to the University's commitment to a successful Division-I athletics program."

X-Country again leading the pack

Men's and women's teams determined to defend 1999 Patriot League titles

By Rose Sedo

Enthusiasm and expectations are both running high as the Bucknell men's and women's cross-country teams prepare for their first races of the season this coming Saturday.

Last season, both teams swept the Patriot League titles and the women finish 24th in the nation at the NCAA championships. Both teams have been picked to win the 2000 Patriot League titles in the League's preseason polls.

Taking place on Bucknell's own golf course, the meet is considered to be somewhat of a tradition. It occurs on the same week every year, with Bucknell competing against Rutgers, Syracuse and Manhattan.

Bison captain Becki Marshall '02

According to head coach Art Gulden, this first meet tends to set the stage for the rest of the season, serving as an indication of the future potential of the team.

"It's a good opportunity to see where we are because we can always compare the meet to how we did last year," said Gulden. "The meet is also a great indicator of which individual runners are ready to perform at a highly-competitive level."

"We lost two seniors on both the men's and women's teams, but somehow we always seem to have folks to take over those spots," Gulden said. "So we anticipate to perform at least as well as we did last year, if not better."

Those athletes who will step up to the pressure are still a mystery. Yet, the women's team has already been ranked as 28th in the nation, and the team captains have been greatly encouraged by the exceptional caliber of preseason practices.

"I think this year the team shows the right amount of talent, determination and confidence to meet the challenges that lie ahead," captain Becki Marshall '02 said.

Without a doubt, the forecasts for the Bison men's and women's cross-country teams are looking good, as the teams possess the experience and depth to defend their '99 Patriot League titles.

Bison have their eyes on the prize

Experienced and talented, the field hockey squad is hungry for League crown

By Carmen Mauriello

After falling just one game short of a Patriot League Championship in 1999 and returning eight starters, including three All-Patriot League defenders, it doesn't take a brain surgeon to determine what the 2000 Bucknell field hockey team has set its sights on.

"We want to return to the Patriot League Championship, and win it," echoed sophomore goalkeeper Sonja Wettergreen.

The Bison definitely have the talent, experience and determination to achieve their ultimate goal, but after dropping two of their first three games, the Bison realize they still may have a long road ahead of them.

For the third consecutive year, the Bison opened their season against the Drexel Dragons. And for the third straight time, the Dragons got the better of the encounter, dropping Bucknell 5-1. The Dragons outshot the Bison 18-1 in the first half to roll to a 2-0 halftime advantage. Dena Ebert '02 scored early in the second half to cut the deficit to one, but the Dragons responded with three unanswered goals to seal the victory.

"I thought we played really well for about 30 of the 70 minutes," head coach Heather Lewis said. "We are just consistency away from being a solid team."

Next the Bison traveled to Siena and improved their record to 1-1 with a convincing 3-0 non-conference victory. Anne Hunsicker '02 opened the scoring with an unassisted goal midway through the first half, and then in the second half assisted captain Maura Higgs '01 off a corner kick to pad the Bison lead to 2-0.

Midfielder Erin Plasteras '02 found the net off a pass from sophomore forward Amy Marvel to close the scoring. The relentless Bison attack outshot the Saints, 14-5, and held a 13-2 advantage in corner kicks.

Wettergreen denied five shots to pick up her first shutout of the season.

The Bison closed out their three-game road trip with a hard-fought 2-1 loss against Towson this past Tuesday. Bucknell jumped out to an early lead when Melissa Maher found the net from 12 yards out of a Hunsicker pass.

But that's where the offense ended for the Orange and Blue, as they were only able to muster three more shots during the games remainder. Towson stepped up the pressure on the Bison defense, and Joann Engstrom broke a 1-1 tie with her second goal of the game with 11:24 remaining, giving Towson the victory.

"We played well, but there are some small things we need to improve upon," Wettergreen said. "We need to capitalize on scoring opportunities and improve our communication on offense."

The anemic offensive performance isn't indicative of the talent and depth of the Bison's front line. The speedy unit is led by Higgs, captain Brett Russo '01, Ebert and Maher.

With our returning players and newcomers combined, I look at possibly having six to seven players who could start on any given day," Lewis said.

Midfielders Hunsicker, Marvel and Lauren Campbell '02 must fill the shoes of graduated regional All-Americans Kate Twombly and Jen Zimmerman. Lewis believes that the trio's extensive playing experience will allow them to quickly mesh into a confident and productive unit.

The strength of this year's Bison will undoubtedly be the defense. Senior tri-captain Katie Yingling, a 1999 second team All-Patriot League selection, and All-Patriot League Monica McCorry will anchor the back line, along with juniors Erin Plasteras and Meghan Hopping.

Bucknell's net will be well-guarded by Wettergreen, tabbed as the 1999 Patriot League Rookie of the Year.

"We're an experienced team and we know where each other are on the field," Ebert said. "We're getting better in each game."

If the Bison can improve upon their consistency and enhance their scoring opportunities in time for their Patriot League schedule, there's no doubt that they'll be a major player in the Patriot League championship race.

Tate Greditzer '01

By David Tomaiino

Tate Greditzer '01 is armed, dangerous and wanted for aggravated assault of the goal. The left arm of this St. Louis, Mo. native has fired shots on opposing goalies at an alarming rate, picking apart the net with sniper-like proficiency.

Greditzer had an impressive campaign last year, leading the team with 75 goals and tallying 33 assists, which was second on the team.

His accuracy was even more impressive, as 60 percent of his shots found the back of the net. Aiding in Bucknell's wins over Salem-Telkyo (13-4), Navy "B" (11-5) and the Merchant Marine Academy (10-3) this past weekend at the Navy Invitational with three goals in each of the contests.

It's no secret how Greditzer consistently finds the cage. "Tate has a good, strong, athletic shot, he is very good at our counter attack, because of his size and speed," head coach John Ziegler said. "That combination of size and speed earned Greditzer first team honors on the Collegiate Water Polo Association Southern Division team. Lifting, running and playing in a men's league three days a week in the summer has Greditzer on top of his game and one step ahead of his foes."

Looking to improve on a 19-11 overall record last season, the Bucknell men's water polo team is off to a 3-1 start in 2000. Greditzer and the rest of the Bison will be on the loose this weekend as they travel to Princeton, New Jersey to take on archrivals Johns Hopkins, Queens, Salem and Princeton.

Tiger Woods—the best ever?

After an outstanding summer, Woods is beginning to rewrite the history books

By Kevin Logan

Say the name Eldrick Woods and many people won't bat an eyelash. But say "Tiger" and you'll conjure up images of a man with a passion for the game of golf, a man who went on a ferocious tear of the golf links this summer.

Tiger simply became the man to beat, leaving the competition behind to battle for second place. But is he the best ever?

Woods entered eight tournaments this summer, starting back in May. Five of those finished with Woods' name on top of the leaderboard, including both the U.S. and British Opens and the PGA Championship.

The Championship wasn't an easy victory, as it came down to a dramatic three-hole playoff between Woods and Bob May. Woods pulled out the victory after the two players had their fair share of both good and ugly shots. Woods sticking a pretty sand shot only a few feet from the pin to capture the win on the final hole.

While Tiger faced some serious competition in the Championship, he outright ran away with titles in other tournaments, notably the British Open in July. With that eight-stroke victory, he completed his career grand slam and set new major championship and British Open records for lowest score (relative to par) with a 19-under 269.

Woods became just the fifth player in history to win all four major championships, joining an elite group comprised of Jack Nicklaus, Gene Sarazan, Ben Hogan and Gary Player.

The win last month at the PGA Championship also made him the youngest player to capture a grand-slam. Additionally, Tiger is the first to win three out of four consecutive majors since Ben Hogan (53), first to hold three of four major titles simultaneously since Jack Nicklaus (72), first to win both the U.S. and British Opens in the same year since Tom Watson (82), and first to win consecutive majors since Nick Price (94).

He also became the third ever to shoot all four rounds of the British Open in the 60's (67-66-67-69). And only once since May has his scorecard shown worse than -10. As a result of his outstanding play, Woods has amassed a total of over $7.6 million to date this year. No. 1 on the PGA Tour.

But do all his victories and all his records qualify him as the best to ever take up the sport? Jack Nicklaus thinks so. And when the Golden Bear makes a comment of that magnitude, you have to take it to heart. Yet Tiger still has his weaknesses and is by no means unbeatable.

There's no doubt he's had an amazing year (and career), but if you can recall when Woods first hit the golf scene big back in 1997 with a win at the Masters, he soon after fell into a slump, and it seemed the Tiger phenomenon was a short-lived fad.

So it seems a bit premature to slap Tiger with the title of Greatest Golfer Ever. But he most certainly has the potential to earn that title. He is only 24 years of age and has matured since the '97

Woods won five of the eight tournaments that he entered this summer.

Masters, returning this year to prove to critics that he has what it takes to be a dominant force in the PGA for years to come. Should he continue on this path for years to come, he'll be sure to surpass yet more milestones and vault to the top as the greatest golfer who ever lived.

Colorado's Helton latest to chase .400—the age-old Williams' record

By Rob Schmicker

In the past decade, Americans have seen some of baseball's most prestigious records broken. No one could have imagined that anyone would even come close to Lou Gehrig's consecutive game mark, or that the Yankees could win 114 games in the regular season. And who could ever forget the summer of '98 when Big Mac and Sammy both destroyed Roger Maris's home run record?

So in today's offensive explosion one of the two most elusive milestones appears ready to be had (and not DiMaggio's 56—game hitting streak). No one has done it in 59 years and every time someone flirts with it, he always falls short. No one since the legendary Ted Williams has hit .400 for a season, but Colorado's Todd Helton is seriously pursuing the milestone.

Since 1980, George Brett has come the closest. He was at the mark as late as September 4, only to fall short at .390 in the end. Then in 1993, John Olerud flirted with .400 until August 2, only to go into a horrendous slump and finish at .363. Even this year, hopes of .400 were running high, as Boston's Nomar Garciaparra was around .400 until a slump of his own brought him back down to earth. While Garciaparra plummeted, Helton hit .476 in August to put him at .395 at the month's end.

Baseball fans all want to see someone reach .400, but did anyone think that it might be Todd Helton, a former starting QB at the University of Tennessee? Obviously not, but maybe we should have.

Helton is not only an awesome athlete, but he plays the game for fun, and most importantly, he hits at hitter-friendly Coors Field. And instead of being a single-dimension power hitter, Helton does it all. He leads the league with 53 doubles while hitting 33HR's and 121RBI's. Also, he has been walked 89 times while striking out only 48 times.

So can he get it done? As of today, Helton is at .384 with 23 games left. Of those 23, thirteen are at home, where Helton is hitting .407 on the year. Down the stretch Colorado plays Los Angeles, San Diego, Florida, Arizona and Atlanta.

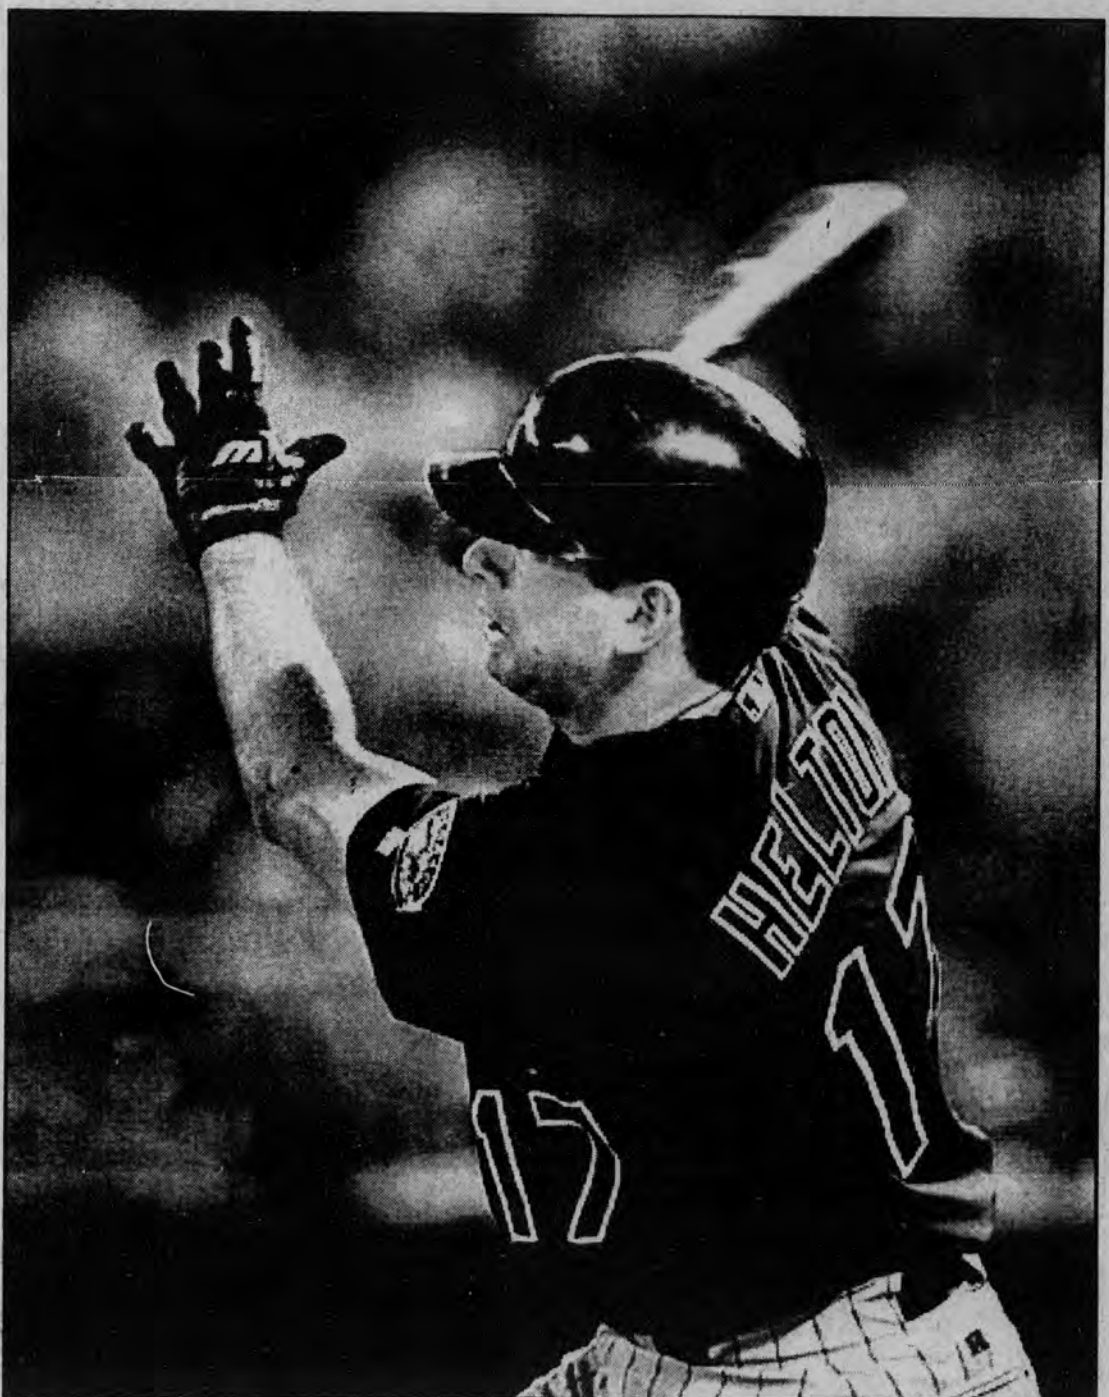

The good news is that he is hitting a combined .490 against the Marlins and Padres; but on the other hand, he is only hitting .235 against the other three.

Overall, the stretch opponents for Colorado isn't that bad, and should enable Helton to at least come close to .400. But it's going to be extremely hard to do. Remember, Tony Gwynn, Wade Boggs and George Brett, three of the best contact hitters of our age, never hit .400. Brett, who was at .400 in September had this to say, "With a few weeks to go I was still over .400, and I did one thing I probably shouldn't have done: I tried to hit .400 rather than just go out and not worry about it." And of course, Brett fell short.

So while the media plays it up, Helton has to remain steady and focused. Batting .400 would be nearly impossible if Helton lets the hype go to his head. If he continues to do what he has done all year though, someday you may hear Todd Helton's name in the same breath as Ted Williams.

Colorado slugger Helton needs a September like his .476 July to finish at .400, and he has 23 games to increase his current .384 average. Helton's run is comparable to Brett's .390 season.

NFL Experts' Picks

By Justin McCarthy and Ali Ahmed

Green Bay at Buffalo

The Packers offense will need to turn in a better performance than they did last week against the Jets; however, that does not look possible, considering they are playing the Buffalo Bills, who were ranked number one in total defense last season. The Bills one defensive blemish may be their secondary, but they should still possess the number one ranked defense this year. The Bills have a very well balanced attack and should be able to go down field effectively and score against a Packers defense that allowed 379 yards last week. The Bills will also need to protect Rob Johnson better, who was sacked five times last week.

Justin's Pick: Buffalo by nine
This game might not be as interesting as might have been with a healthy Green Bay team. The Bills should have no problem establishing a running game and their defense should be able to shut down a questionable Green Bay offense. The Bills should easily run the ball about 40 times or more.

Ali's Pick: Buffalo by 25

Chicago at Tampa Bay

The Bucs definitely have the defense of a Super Bowl caliber team. The question is whether their offense can put numbers on the board. The off-season acquisition of Keyshawn Johnson will definitely bolster a passing game that finished second to last in the league last season. The Bucs line though will need to give second year quarterback Shaun King ample time in the pocket to find Johnson downfield. If they can add a formidable passing game, and with Alstott running over defensive lines, the Bucs are in for a memorable season. The Bears passing offense was surprisingly one of the best in the league last season, and that aspect of their game should remain solid. The variables lie in their rushing game and defense. With their lackluster rushing game teams don't have to worry about stacking the box.

Justin's Pick: Tampa Bay by 17
In the off season the Bears revamped their defense and Tampa did the same with its offense. This game could highlight some of the new additions that each team made. Will Keyshawn co? It really should not matter, as the Bucs defense should give second-year quarterback Cade McNown trouble.

Ali's Pick: Tampa Bay by seven

Washington at Detroit

The Redskins made major off-season acquisitions and turned themselves into a Super Bowl contender. Their offense ranked second in the league last year, and with the defensive additions of Deion Sanders, Bruce Smith and rookie LaVar Arrington, the defense looks to turn around from its horrible season last year. The Redskins though have an offense consisting of Davis, the NFC's leading rusher last season, and dangerous receivers for Brad Johnson to connect with in Westbrook and Connell, that can compensate if their defense has a poor outing. The Lions are finally starting to recover from their loss of Barry Sanders, with their acquisition of James Stewart. However, they will still need to have a decent passing game to stay competitive, and with starting quarterback Charlie Batch questionable for next week's game, that just adds more doubts about the offense's effectiveness.

Justin's Pick: Washington by 12
Stephen Davis: nine years for $90 million? Redskins owner Snyder continues to make stupid decision after stupid decision. Jeff George, Deion Sanders, Darryl Green, Bruce Smith and two of the top three picks. Sure it looks good now, but wait until they hit the salary cap in two years. But anyway the game should be an easy one for the Skins. Detroit has its own problems with injuries, especially at QB.

Ali's Pick: Washington by 28

St. Louis at Seattle

The Rams are just as good and deep as they were last year, and last year they had the number one—ranked offense and they were also number one against the run on defense. The Rams just need Warner to perform his usual magic, and to get the ball into the hands of Faulk and Bruce. Seattle, if it hope to even keep this game close, will need to meet Faulk at the line and not let him get into the open field. The Seahawks will also need Kennedy, Sinclair and Chad Brown to put pressure on Warner in the pocket. If Warner is allowed time, he can, and will, tear apart any defense. Seattle will need another strong performance from Ricky Waters, but more importantly they need Jon Kitna to step up and take the team to the next level.

Justin's Pick: St. Louis by 30
Mike Holmgren probably misses Brett Favre (a lot more than Favre misses Holmgren), after the performance Kitna put in last week. Seattle is going through a mini—rebuilding phase, but the debacle at Miami was embarrassing. Even the defense did not play up to expectations. Still the Seahawks should look forward to rookie Shaun Alexander to start contributing. St. Louis looks like it has not lost a step on offense but the defense looks questionable. The question is whether St. Louis good enough to compete with other teams that improved themselves, like Tampa and Washington.

Ali's Pick: St. Louis by 17

New England at NY Jets

Both teams are struggling to recover from uncharacteristic 8-8 seasons last year. The Jets have a great running back in Curtis Martin, and a great quarterback in Testaverde; the one piece missing from the puzzle is a play-making receiver. Keyshawn Johnson will be missed on offense, and although Chereb could fill the void partially, the Jets will need another receiver to step up big. The Jets should establish their running game against the Patriots first, just like Tampa Bay did last week, forcing the Patriots to stack the box and thus keeping the middle of the field open for their receivers. The Patriots will need to depend on their line to stop the strong, slashing running of Martin. They will also need to lean on Bledsoe and Glenn and company to put points on the board.

Justin's Pick: NY Jets by four

Oakland at Indianapolis

This should be one of the best games in week 2. Woodson against Marvin Harrison should be one of the best matchups in the NFL. Although the Raiders defense is excellent can their offense do enough to compliment its defense? Furthermore, somebody please explain why they took a kicker in the first round? By the way their offense played against San Diego, the Raiders should have spent their pick on a wide receiver or running back. This should be a good test to see if James can continue his excellent rookie year performance.

Hardt reorganizes Athletics Department

By Carmen Mauriello

Bucknell Athletic Director John Hardt has instituted a plan to improve communication in the Athletics Department, enhance recreational opportunities for all students, increase gender equity in athletics, and improve the handling of the athletic department's finances.

To achieve these goals, Hardt has delegated the responsibility to oversee Bucknell's 28 varsity sports and numerous programs to a sport management team consisting of himself, 1991 Bucknell graduate Tim Pavlechko and assistant AD Heather

Lewis. Hardt also created two full-time posts out of responsibilities formerly carried out by Bison coaches, naming Terrie Grieb associate AD for business and team services and Rose Ewan as the associate AD for recreation services. The summer also saw the hiring of new Bison women's golf, wrestling, men's and women's water polo and softball coaches.

Pavlechko returns to Bucknell after managing the athletics program of the University of Nevada, Las Vegas for five years and working the past three years as the NCAA's Assistant Director of Championships.

In his new position as Bucknell's Associate Director of Athletics for Sports Management and Administration, Pavlechko will be responsible for supervising 11 varsity sports in addition to overseeing the department's programs in athletic training and sports medicine, drug and alcohol education, strength and conditioning, equipment operation, computing and technology and cheerleading.

Lewis has been promoted to Associate Director of Athletics/Senior Woman Administrator after coaching the Bucknell field hockey team for eight years though she will continue in her coaching post. In addition to overseeing 14 Bison sports and serving as the Patriot League "scheduler," Lewis will oversee the department's NCAA compliance, student-athlete financial aid, gender equity and the "sideline coach" program.

By sharing the responsibilities for Bucknell's varsity sports and athletic programs, Hardt hopes that the members of the sports management team can keep in closer contact with coaches and more efficiently address the Department's current and long-term priorities, which include the major athletic facilities expansion project that is currently getting underway.

"By creating this new sports management group of senior administrators, we are taking the necessary steps to establish more frequent and standardized communications throughout the department," Hardt said. "One of our primary goals is to make certain that everyone is on the same page" with regards to the Department's priorities and expectations."

The Department's gender equity program will be enhanced by the freeing of two women's sport head coaches from dividing their time between coaching and administrative responsibilities. Grieb will be retiring as head softball coach to continue, in a full-time role, as associate AD for business and team services. Ewan will assume the responsibility over recreational services from head volleyball coach Cindy Opalski as associate AD for recreation services.

Head coach hirings included former assistant coach Kevin Jamieson in women's golf, former interim women's water polo coach John Ziegler in men's and women's water polo, former assistant coach Tim Wittman in wrestling and Janelle Breneman in softball.

Men's polo returns talented group from successful '99

By Brooke Rea

Boasting a 3-1 finish at the Navy Invitational this past weekend and a core group of talented veterans who contributed to last season's 19-11 record, the men's water polo team kicked off what could be its best season to date.

Most of the 1999 squad, which earned the Orange and Blue its best record in 14 years, returns as the Bison lose only three players and welcome four promising new freshmen.

Under the leadership of new head men's and women's coach John Zeigler and senior captains Kevin Pemi-sohn and Justin McCarthy, the Bison will rely on a motion offense and individual speed to finish at the top of the competitive Southern Division of the Collegiate Water Polo Association. The league includes George Washington, Princeton, Slippery Rock, Navy, Johns Hopkins, Salem-Teikyo University, Washington and Jefferson and Grove City College.

"The experience and leadership of the seniors will be the most critical factor in our success this season," Zeigler said. "Our conference and the entire East Coast has tightened up as far as the quality of competition. On any given day any of these teams could beat one another."

In day two of competition the Bison again stomped the competition with a 13-4 victory over Salem-Teikyo University and an 11-5 win over Navy "B." Salem-Teikyo was a big win for the Bison, as they fell to STU last year at the Southern Championships. Greditzer netted three goals in each game and Kennedy came through with 37 saves in the two contests.

"I wasn't pleased with how we failed to start with intensity to compete in the first game," Zeigler said. "But I was happy that we didn't allow that to affect our subsequent games. We used the opportunity to play against some weaker teams to help us improve on a new offense and sharpen our defense and counterattack skills."

The Bison will compete this weekend in the Princeton Invitational, and will host tournaments the following two weekends at Freas-Rooke Pool.

seventh in scoring for the 1999 season. Sophomores and rookies look promising as well. Zeigler notes, "Sophomores Dan Lommerdal and Chris Saxton should make an immediate impact on offense and defense," he said. "Freshman Jamie Sattelle looks promising offensively and with defense improvement could challenge for a starting role. Other freshmen to watch are Scott Afzal and John Kearney, who both looked promising in preseason."

After nearly three weeks of intense practice, the men had an opportunity to see where they stand at Navy this past weekend and made an impressive showing. In their first game against Iona the Bison fell 16-2, a loss Zeigler attributes to a lack of intensity and preseason fatigue. Both goals that game came from Greditzer off three attempts. Unfazed by that defeat, however, the Orange and Blue rallied to beat U.S. Merchant Marine 10-3 with three goals from Greditzer and two each from Mante and Ryan McCarthy.

The traditionalist in you would say this would be a great game ... and with the Irish knocking off another perennial Big 12 power last week, you think they would have a shot against the Cornhuskers. You'd be wrong. Touchdown Jesus can only do so much. Dan Alexander and Eric Crouch will run over an overmatched Notre Dame defense, despite what the sports editor says.

The days of Hurricane football are back. The Canes have the bulk of a talented '99 team coming back, and should once again be a major player on the national championship scene. This should by no means be an easy game for them though, with Washington featuring Taia-sosopo, one of the few quarterbacks ever to pass for 300 yards and rush for 200 in the same game. Nevertheless, the Canes have revenge on their mind, as their last matchup with Washington was labeled "the Whammy at Miami" as the Huskies ended the Canes' 58 game home winning streak 38-20 back in 1994. This should be the game of the week.

This is pretty much the only other notable game this week. In its victory over Fresno State last week, the Buckeye offense was outscored 28-15, by their own defense. If they ever want to get back to their '99 form, quarterback Steve Bellasari has got to get things going. Arizona, though, has offensive problems of its own. On opening day, their offense managed to score only 10 points against an anemic Utah defense. The Bucks will not play well, but they will keep dreams of an undefeated season alive ... at least for now.

Sure, the Buffaloes are coming off a disappointing loss to Colorado State, but they are still a solid team. Plus, they have one of the best coaches in college football with Gary Barnett. If he can turn Northwestern into a football school, he can do anything. USC looked good against what we thought was a solid Penn State team, but then again, so did Toledo. Colorado will be pumped for their first conference game, and take the Trojans by surprise in an offensive slugfest. Just you wait.

Powell '02 averaged 6.4 yards per carry in '99.

By Cory Nadler

Coming off what some say was a disappointing 7-4 1999 season, the Bucknell Bison football team is looking to improve in its 2000 campaign. Although the Bison did not get off the game with a field goal in the fourth quarter. Bucknell had a chance to score late in the game, but their drive was stopped when they fumbled deep in the Spiders' zone.

Bucknell was controlling the game in the first half, and Richmond gave the Bison the position to put the game away. The Bison were able to block two punts, giving them great field position. But, Bucknell missed two field goals, which could have made a big difference in the outcome of the game.

Although there may have been more that the Bucknell offense could have done to help their cause, Gadd did mention that the Spiders' defense was the best he had seen in his six years here at Bucknell. He went on to say that Richmond may very well be "the strongest team" on the Bucknell schedule this season.

There is one major difference in the Spiders from the other teams on the Bison schedule this season. Richmond only threw the ball 11 times the entire game, as opposed to the 35 pass attempts by the two Bucknell quarterbacks, Todd Wenrich '03 and Lucas Phillips '01. Most of the teams in the Patriot League pass the ball a lot more than Richmond did.

With the strength of the Bucknell defense thought to be their secondary, this should bode well for the remainder of the season. Overall, the Bucknell defense looks very strong. And they played very well too, stuffing most of the 60 running attempts brought at them, although the Spiders scored a touchdown on a quarterback option in the third quarter.

Defensive captain and middle linebacker Vince Ficca '01 said the Richmond quarterback was a very good athlete, and Bucknell missed just a few tackles all game long. "If we can continue to play well and stay healthy we should be all set," Ficca said.

The defense will be the strongest part of the Bison football team this season. Bucknell is returning nine of their 11 starters from last season, including their entire secondary, which consists of six seniors.

The Bison lost defensive lineman John Papadakis and inside linebacker Sean Redd, who was last season's most valuable player. Both were intricate parts of the defense, but the Bison have experienced veterans to fill the holes. Namely Ficca, as exemplified by his being named the Patriot League Defensive Player of the Week, after posting 12 tackles against Richmond.

On the offensive side of the ball, the Bison lost quarterback Don McDowell and tight end Corey Hurley but return a talented backfield for 2000. Gadd praised Hurley as the best tight end in the Patriot League in '99, so it is going to be tough to fill his shoes.

Looking to the future of the Bison in 2000, the running back position looks to be the deepest of all, as Bucknell returns two proven backfielders in the backfield. Marrow is Bucknell's go-to man near the goal line, and he is currently approaching several team scoring records. Marrow will be blocking for Jabu Powell '02, who rushed for an impressive 6.4 yards per carry last season.

At quarterback, there is no definite starter as yet. Wenrich did start the game against Richmond, but Phillips saw a good amount of playing time.

"The league is wide open this year, but it is usually won by a team that has a standout offensive player to carry the load," Gadd said. The Bison are hoping

Volleyball seeks return to League elite

The 1999 season for the Bison was mediocre. An 11-11 overall record was only good enough to put the team in a tie for third place in the Patriot League, and the season was somewhat of a disappointment when you consider Bucknell's recent success in the sport.

However, the team has 12 letterwinners returning, which creates hope for vast improvement in 2000.

"With our good team chemistry and strong leadership we have a very promising future," coach Cindy Opalski said.

Michelle Lesh and Jen Post, last year's co-captains and only seniors, provided leadership that will be tough to replace. But senior captains Brooke Bader and Nicole LaMotte are confident that they can bring the team together.

"We have to help our players gain confidence because we have a good player at every position this year," Bader said.

The Bison will also look to some underclassmen to complement the more experienced players. "The Trapasso twins, two freshmen, have good skill and could see some time this year," Opalski said.

This year the Patriot League is more competitive than ever. Colgate is the league favorite, and Army and Lehigh should also be tough. Despite having to compete in a challenging league, Opalski is optimistic about how the team will fair.

"It's going to be difficult to get another conference championship, but with some work we can do it," she said.

This past weekend the Bison traveled to upstate New York to play their first matches of the season. They first dined with Buffalo. The Bison fought hard, and the match could have gone either way, but Buffalo ended up on top, squeaking by in the deciding fifth game by a score of 15-13.

Bucknell next met the Providence Friars. The Bison were competitive in the beginning, but were the eventual losers. The Friars defeated the Bison 3-0. "I felt like we were the better team, but we lacked execution," Bader said.

After assessing their performance in the first two matches, the Bison were ready for improvement. Opalski knew that they would have to improve their serving and serve returning if they were to defeat Canisius, their next opponent.

After losing the first game 15-12, the vengeful Bison drubbed Canisius in the next three games by a combined score of 45-14.

Junior Whitney Williams lead Bucknell throughout the tournament, and earned a spot on the All-Tournament team as a result. Junior Shannon Walker, who recorded 33 kills in the three matches, was also a key contributor.

"Shannon had a very good tournament, and she has the potential to do even more. She's one of the best hitters in the conference," Opalski said.

The Bison traveled to Penn State last night to challenge the defending national champion Nittany Lions. Penn State was just too much for the Bison, allowing Bucknell just five points in a three set sweep.

Next up for the Bison is the Youngstown State Tournament this Friday and Saturday.

Shannon Walker '02 at the net for the Bison. Walker tallied 33 kills in the Bison's last tournament.

By Jeff Summerhill

Bucknell women's varsity four crew boat won their event at the prestigious Henley Regatta in England. The crew traveled to England in June to participate in this international regatta. The boat consisted of coxswain Linda Voll '03 and rowers Ann Calagni '00, Julie Engel '03, Elizabeth Barrows '00, and Kelly Wagner '00.

These ladies won four levels of head-to-head racing before making it to the final race. The boat won the final but was then disqualified on a questionable interference call by the judges. Despite this setback the ladies still had a successful season.

In the regular season the Women's Varsity Four won six gold medals and four silver medals. This includes a silver medal at the Dad Vail Regatta in Philadelphia, Pa. and a silver medal at the Champion International Collegiate Regatta (CICR) in Worcester, Mass. The four became the most successful crew in Bucknell's history with a 62-6 win-loss record.

The women's varsity pair of Keri Heuberger '02 and Sarah Diengen '00 also had a highly successful spring season. They took a gold medal in each of the seven races they attended. In their undated season these ladies posted a 22-0 win-loss record. Their season concluded with a dominating 15-second victory at the Dad Vail Regatta.

The men's boats had an exciting spring season as well. The men's second novice eight became the Patriot League Champions in their event during the Patriot League race in Worcester, Mass. They capped off an incredible season making the grand final event at the CICR in early May. The men's first novice eight made it to the semi-final round of racing at the Dad Vail Regatta and also won the third level final at CICR. The men's varsity lightweight eight faced tough competition throughout their spring season but finished with victories over some important rival teams.

With a strong group of returning rowers, there is much optimism for the 2000-2001 season. They are looking to continue on last year's success and are excited for a new freshmen squad. No experience is necessary, as most of the team is walk-ons that did not row in high school. Any freshmen interested in becoming part of the rowing tradition at Bucknell are reminded that there is an Interest Meeting tonight at 8pm in the LC Forum. Please attend this meeting if you are interested in rowing or would like questions answered. Woman or man, short or tall, crew could be the sport for you.

Call up Doc Brown, hop into that Dolorian, zoom back to Week 1 of the 2000 NFL season, and you'd win yourself enough greenbacks to say sayonara Lewisburg, hello Beverly Hills.

On paper it looks like this: the Cowboys, America's team (OK, Dallas' team), healthy for the first time in years, with a lineup eerily familiar to that which brought home three NFL titles in the 90s. Gun-slinger Troy Aikman running a new-and-improved offense which complements short drops and quick throws, which utilizes his accurate arm and significantly reduces the hits he'll take. His targets: 42 million-dollar man Joey Galloway, a key acquisition from Seattle who possesses an uncanny ability to get open and make plays like the venerable Michael Irvin, and Raghib Ismail, a speedy long-ball threat along the lines of Alvin Harper.

Then there's Emmitt, still an explosive runner with a remarkable nose for the end zone at age 31, and finally healthy for once. Tight end David LaFleur is a great pass-catching tight end comparable to Jay Novacek. The O line appears to be returning to its days of dominance, with the return of Erik Williams and the development of several younger players.

The defense, stingy as always, returns nearly all of its key players from a unit that ranked ninth overall and sixth against the run in '99. Some analysts predicted a revival of the 'Boys glory days. Almost all predicted at least a playoff birth.

Then there's "da Birds." (Oh wait, that's "da Bears.") Anyway, the 2000 Eagles were nearly identical to their '99 team, but that's no compliment when you finished 5-11, had the NFL's worst passing game and ranked 28th defensively against the pass.

On offense, their only gamebreaker was Allen Iverson (it's the truth). But on defense, they do return Mike Mamula (who's best attribute is that his name gets catchy after you say it a couple times, Mamula, Ca-stan-za).

To further diminish the slim chances the Eagles had against the Cowboys, factor in that the Eagles were playing at Dallas, where they'd only won twice at in the previous 10 years, and that Philly had only won one road game in the past three seasons.

USA Today's Danny Sheridan gave the Eagles 15 million—to one odds of winning the Super Bowl this year, and that was generous.

So what happened? It wasn't a particular moment in the game, like Eagles' coach Andy Reid's decision to open the game with an onside kick, the pickle juice and water martini he served his players to combat the 171 degree on-the-turf temperature, or his decision to blitz Aikman from the get-go.

It was the attitude of these events—all the out, try anything, nothing to lose attitude of Reid and his players. The Eagles needed to win the game, the Cowboys wanted to.

What resulted was possibly one of the most shocking and lopsided upsets in the NFL in recent years and a dramatic twist of fate for their franchises.

The Cowboys' predicted resurgence will now turn into rebuilding. Starting from the best news, Aikman was 0-5 with an interception in the game before leaving with a concussion, the 10th of his career (by his admission). In comes Randall Cunningham, who wasn't able to generate much offense but he did manage to aggravate his sprained thumb.

Next year "emergency" quarterback, star receiver Galloway, tears his ACL on one of the games final plays (when he already should have been on the bench) and is out for the season. Great.

Besides that, the O line was inept at handling the Eagles rush and paved the way for Emmitt to gain a whole 29 yards. LaFleur didn't catch a pass, and, oh yea, the defense allowed 306 yards rushing.

The Eagles made that one guy who picked them to win the Super Bowl crack a big smile. Not only did they find a franchise back in Staley, McNabb displayed his increased maturity and poise from his freshman campaign and Mamula and his defensive buddies made a case for a nickname of the "Green People Eaters."

This year was the Cowboys' year. Another wasted year and another concussion may cause the 33-year-old Aikman to think twice about retirement and with that the rest of the aging 'Boys will disintegrate. Jerry Jones will be left holding the pieces and he'll need to pick up the phone and beg his still good buddy Jimmy Johnson for another miracle.

The Eagles will prove to themselves and the entire league that you can achieve the success by establishing a unit and working hard to develop the personnel you possess, rather than trying to revamp your lineup every year. They will continue to improve throughout the season and contend for the NFC East title.

Despite lacking the flashy names, the Eagles displayed the heart, attitude and intensity that wins games; the Cowboys failed to display any of these attributes, and now they lack the flashy names, too.

New faces in Administration

By Jim Leahy

The University's administration has seen much upheaval in the last few months.

With the exception of Peggy Plympton, vice president for finance and administration, there are no more of President Adams' appointees left at the University.

President Steffen H. Rogers comes to the University by way of Clemson where he served as Provost. He has taken the post that was vacated by Adams when it was announced that he would become the next president of Colby College in Waterville, Maine.

In addition to the departure of President Adams, four former administrators have left the University to take positions elsewhere.

Dan Little, former vice president for academic affairs, has left the University and taken the Chancellor's position at the University of Michigan, Dearborn. University Director of Principle

Both Trudy Cunningham and Joseph Humphrey, associate dean and dean of engineering, respectively, have left; Humphrey to take an administrative position in the engineering department of the University of Virginia, and Cunningham to the University of the South where her husband is now the president.

After the departure of these four, Rogers appointed a total of seven new administrators: five are University employees whom he moved to different positions;

two are new to the University.

Professor of Biology Mitch Chernin has been appointed by President Rogers to be the assistant to the president. Genie Gerdes, former dean of the college of arts and sciences has been appointed as vice president for academic affairs. It will be her job to oversee the colleges of arts and sciences and engineering.

Taking Gerdes' place will be Mark Padilla. He is formerly one of the associate deans in the College of Arts and Sciences. A classics professor as well, Padilla was associate dean of the faculty before assuming the new role.

Richard Ferraro, formerly the dean of students in the general studies program at Columbia University in New York, has taken

Greeks celebrate Bid Day

Fraternities, sororities welcome hundreds of upperclassmen

By Brian Watson

The University's rush process once again brought successful results, culminating in last weekend's Bid Day. Greek leaders sought to maintain last year's growth and did so, with fraternities and sororities gaining large numbers of recruits similar to 1999 statistics.

Dean of Greek Life Roy W. Baker reported that male bid acceptance dropped by almost 30 men, though that calculation was made before open bids were registered. Also, Tau Kappa Epsilon, set to recolonize this fall, had not submitted their roster.

The women saw more success, recruiting almost 290 women before "snap bids"—open bids given to take part in the "no frills" rush process, which requires rushees to attend open suites with all sororities. "Maybe the process is too cumbersome," Baker said, "but we still do it, the women follow it, and they

Baker said that the two presiding organizations have discussed streamlining their respective rush processes, but no definitive steps have been taken.

He does feel, however, that do an extraordinary job."

The North American Interfraternity Conference, which oversees the men's process, does not require such measures. Male rushees are required to visit a minimum of four houses; in addition, no women or alcohol are permitted at these rush events.

"We're doing things that other schools don't," Baker said. "Many schools talk about 'no alcohol' but we really do it." Baker also reported that no University policy violations took place over Bid Weekend.

Following a proposal by Interfraternity Council (IFC) Rush Chair Steve Catherwood '01, IFC voted to reduce the number of total rush events from six to five, cutting down what many believed was a drawn-out process.

The National Panhellenic Conference (NPC), which governs the women's rush, insists that women women's rush was a success. Baker was particularly impressed during his first meetings with the male and female bid acceptees last Saturday. He invited two alumni, Lambda Chi Alpha's Alumni president Rich Sherman and Phi Beta Phi Alumni President Carol Tevis, to help facilitate a mandatory program last Saturday that emphasized lifetime membership.

During the program, which he called "a great tradition that gets better and better each year," sorority bid acceptees filled the room, chanting their respective songs and cheers.

Baker told the Greek community Tuesday night that his co-presidents were extremely impressed and would "never forget" what they experienced.

Just one year ago ... the Flood of '99

By Rebecca Rowland

Approximately one year and one week ago today the Flood of '99 tore through Lewisburg, causing massive damage to the campus and downtown areas.

Rain started to pour down late in the evening on Monday, Sept. 6, 1999. It rained 10 inches in approximately four hours. Many residents of Sixth Street, the area with the most damage, were unaware of the rising floodwaters until the Lewisburg Police Department used air horns and megaphones to alert them to the unfolding danger.

The floodwaters rose until 6:30 am Tuesday, Sept. 7, 1999. At that point in time, all residents of Sixth Street were evacuated and given temporary, on-campus housing. In the end, 13 of 40 homes were deemed uninhabitable due to water damage as well as gas and oil leaks.

The Hunt/Harris parking lot was also hit hard; water from the

Chris Pizzo — The Bucknellian

On Sept. 7, 1999, 10 inches of rain fell in approximately four hours.

creek bordering the parking lot washed over the parked cars, leaving a coating of dirt and debris over exterior and interior surfaces. Many cars also suffered structural damage after floating into other cars.

On campus, the Fieldhouse, Music & Art Building, Swartz Hall, the stadium locker room and the library also fell victim to water damage.

The train overpass on St. George Street, much of Loomis Street, as well as the intersection of Seventh Street and Moore Avenue all suffered structural damage including washed out bridges and sidewalks.

Most students were able to move back into their residences in a relatively short amount of time, although some residences required large amounts of work. A year later, all residences are back to their pre-flood condition.

The damage caused to the campus itself was also fixed in a relatively short time and is now back to its previous condition.

While remote, the likelihood of another flood occurring is not an impossibility. The geographic location of the school—in a valley, bordered by a river, and surrounded by creek beds—lends itself to flooding easily.

However, the amount of rain and the speed with which it fell on the evening of Sept. 6, 1999 was one of those awesome displays of nature that will devastate whatever it comes into contact, wait long enough for the community to forget the threat—and then strike again.

<your name here> Residence Hall

As I arrived back to campus in August, I was curious to view the completion of the new Residence Hall and the progress on the Sigmond Weis Music Building that was constructed next to my dorm all last year. Along with many other Bucknellians, however, I was surprised to see that the dormitory remains nameless, especially since Langone, Rooke and Weis have all been substantial benefactors in the past.

How will the new residence hall get its name? According to John Mosser, interim vice president for university relations, the standard policy of the Board of Trustees is to grant the naming privilege to the donor who provides 50 percent of the total construction costs. Ultimately, the final decision to name the building rests with the Board of Trustees. An exception can be made when the president of the University can make a recommendation to the Board to name a building.

While both the Music Building and the New Residence Hall were being built around the same time frame, the financing plans of the two buildings were different. At the groundbreaking ceremony for the Weis Music Building, the building was dedicated in the name of the Weis family, who also served as the principal donor for the Weis Center for Performing Arts. The Weis and Rooke families partnered together to provide the majority of the Music building's construction costs, but the Rooke family wished to have the building named after Sigmund Weis.

The New Residence Hall was not financed by individual donors; instead, it was funded by a bond issue. The result of the bond issue leaves the building nameless for now. The administration and Board of Trustees is awaiting the possibility of a substantial donation, which would put the University in a stronger financial position.

"There has been no donor yet," Mosser said. "We would, of course, welcome one."

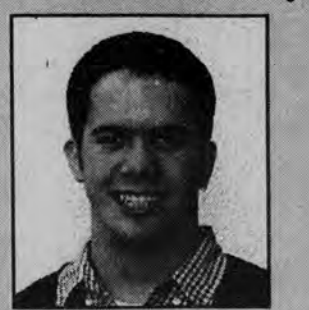

While the final cost of the construction of the residence hall has not been determined, it lies in the ballpark of $14 million. In order for a donor to be considered for the naming opportunity, one must present the University with about $7 million, in accordance to the Board's policy. Figured in the construction costs are the building's endowment and maintenance funds.

I am curious to learn whose name will grace the new dormitory on campus. I wonder whether a major benefactor's name will grace the front wall or perhaps it will be a prominent member of the University's history that made significant progress in guiding the University's path. While monetary donations help improve the quality of life for students and make the University financially stronger, I would rather see long-time professors or administrators approach President Rogers, make suggestions of people that the building should be named after and have Rogers recommend him/her to the Board of Trustees.

I'm sure there's another name like Hunt, Roberts, Larson, Harris, Hill, Rainey, Malcolm and Loomis that could be traditionally immortalized as a residence hall.

nated departments, we're building a safety net to ensure that no one falls through the cracks."

At the Employer Expo, students saw first hand the work of the industry-aimed career development center. Each student was handed a sheet directing them to employers according to industry. Students, too, found it easier to navigate through the rows of tables. "I'm getting a lot of information—even as a chemistry major," Erin McLaughlin '01 said.

Because employers do indeed want students from most any major, students felt more at ease when talking to recruiters. McLaughlin said that she felt the employers wanted to help her, not just gain her as an employee. "The presenters here, especially the alumni, are eager to help Bucknellians. I felt Akzo Nobel, in particular, was very interested in helping me learn. They offer a February internship program for seniors and that shows they're interested in individuals and not just a workforce," McLaughlin said.

Many of the employers present at the Expo will return in October and November for on-campus interviews. Look for upcoming events in New York City and Boston, as well as resume critiques and mock interviews on campus throughout the semester.

As one can imagine, the transition from Hollywood to Lewisburg hasn't been the easiest thing in the world for Faden.

"It has been a massive culture shock," Faden said. "Although that isn't necessarily bad."

Faden enjoys the small town feel that Lewisburg provides along with the fact that he can move around the community fairly easily.

"In Los Angeles, trying to meet someone took a lot of planning and even then you weren't sure if you anyone would be on time," Faden said. "The traffic in the city prevents everyone from being punctual. I really enjoy the fact that I can get where I need to be at the maximum of 15 minutes."

Faden brings film studies to campus

By Ryan Delahanty

The University has added film classes to this year's English department curriculum and Eric Faden, recently transported from the limelight of Hollywood, has signed on to teach many of the new classes.

Professor Faden began his lengthy eight year academic career at Emory University in Atlanta. Faden graduated with degrees in political science and English, with a heavy concentration in film studies. After Emory, he pursued a graduate degree from the University of Florida, where he received Masters in Mass Communications and Film.

In 1995 Faden headed out to Los Angeles to work at the Samuel Goldwyn Company. Unfortunately, he received some bad news upon his arrival.

"The company had filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy," Faden recalled. Yet this apparent setback actually turned out to be beneficial. Because the staff had diminished from 200 to 50, Faden was able to assume a greater number of roles including script supervision, editing trailers and distribution.

After having accomplished this, Faden went on to get his Ph.D. in film from the University of Florida in 1998 and went on to work on such films as "Suture," "Ruby in Paradise"—Ashley Judd's first film—and "Doom Generation," a dark comedy look at today's young society, that has generated quite a large cult following.

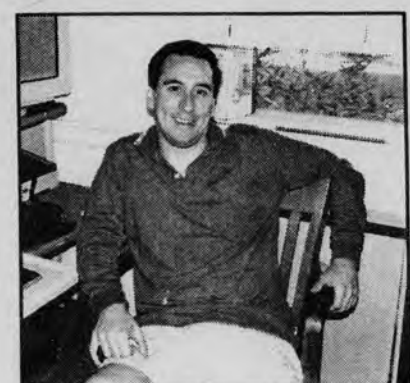

After gaining experience on these films, Faden was asked to work on a project called "Ulee's Gold." Director Victor Nunez asked him aboard the project because Faden had worked on "Ruby in Paradise," which Nunez himself directed. "Ulee's Gold," a small independent film starring Peter Fonda as a bee catcher, was a small project with only 20 or so people working on the film. Faden's official title was production assistant but Faden was often asked to perform various jobs due to the small size of the crew. These jobs provided Faden with invaluable knowledge and expertise about the film making process.

Unfortunately, the size of Irvine was such that Faden was thrust into teaching classes he particularly didn't enjoy, or even worse, those for which he wasn't necessarily qualified.

"I was basically placed where a hole needed to be filled," Faden said. "Most of the time I would be teaching a class of nearly 300 students."

This led Faden to search for a teaching position at a smaller school. This search ultimately led to the University. "The students' overall enthusiasm and the administration's value of teaching prompted me to choose Bucknell," Faden said. Another reason Faden chose to come to the University, was the allure of basically "starting a film studies program from scratch."

"On the one hand I can start knowing that I have the full backing of the English department and the university and I can choose what courses I want to teach," Faden reasoned. "But, it is a difficult choice to decide what classes, how to teach them, and what material to use." Faden currently teaches two courses, both on the introductory level.

English 101: Film and Writing, stresses not only watching the film but also on critical thinking and developing writing skills for the future. Intro to American Cinema covers the history of the film industry, beginning in 1895 and continuing to modern day. Like the first course, this "Hollywood" class has writing workshops periodically throughout the semester, which stress proper grammar, sentence

Debates could be costly for Bush

The first in a series of in-depth, pre-Election Day campaign analyses

By Josh Guyan

I asked veteran conservative journalist and political pundit Robert Novak this summer how much he thought the debates would affect the presidential election. He said he thought Al Gore would beat Bush in the debates, but not by the huge margin that most people expected.

Novak thought that as long as Bush went in prepared and confident, he would come out even because he would be within the margin of expectation.

Apparently Bush and his staff did not heed Mr. Novak's advice.

The Commission on Presidential Debates, a nonprofit, nonpartisan group that has sponsored all general election debates since 1988, came up with a list of three presidential debate dates and locations: Oct. 3 at the University of Massachusetts, Oct. 11 at Wake Forest University, and Oct. 17 at Washington University in St. Louis. Each would be 90 minutes in length and carried on all three major networks.

Gore immediately accepted all three debates. Governor Bush did not.

He accepted only the Commission debate in St. Louis and proposed two hour-long debates, one to be held Sept. 12 on a prime time airing of "Meet the Press" with Tim Russert and the other Oct. 3 on CNN's "Larry King Live." Gore had already agreed on those respective shows that he would debate Bush in both of those forums.

Gore campaign chairman William Daley rejected the Bush camp's proposal, saying that Al Gore wouldn't debate on "Meet the Press" or "Larry King Live" until Governor Bush agreed to the Commission debates. At this point the Bush camp thought they had Gore caught in a lie, and they intended to use it.

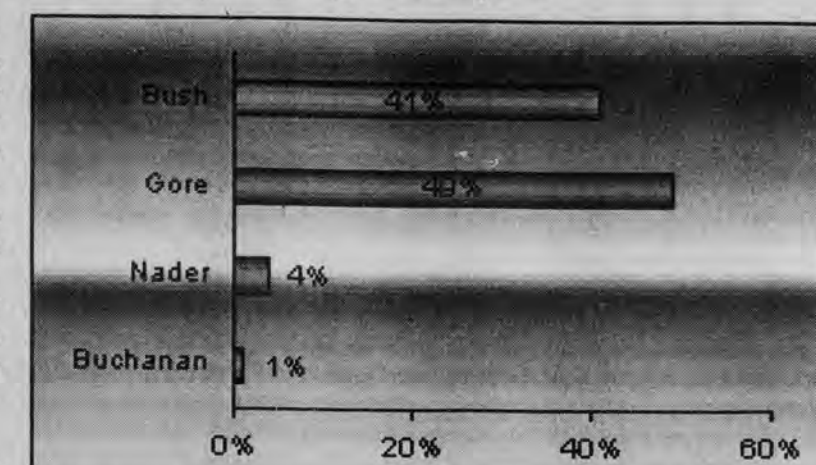

Utilizing the fact that Gore had said on more than one occasion that he would debate his competitor "anytime, anywhere," the Bush campaign went on the attack.

"All of a sudden the words 'anytime, anywhere' don't mean anything. It's time to get some plain-spoken folks in Washington," Bush said at a rally.

Karen Hughes, Bush's director of communications, said, "This is a fundamental question of credibility." The Bush team ran ads saying much to the same effect, that if Gore could be trusted to show up to debates he had already accepted, then he couldn't be trusted at all.

The Gore team's response was powerful and ultimately persuasive. Daley pointed out that Bush's debate schedule would "shortchange Americans by cutting tens of millions of people out of the presidential debate audience... the bipartisan Debate Commission debates will reach the largest possible number of viewers."

That argument was strengthened further when ABC and CBS, the two networks left out of Bush's schedule, announced they would not carry debates on other networks including NBC and CNN.

Gore also reiterated that he would gladly accept any of the other 42 debates proposed by various venues if only Bush would agree to the Debate Commission debates. The Commission debates have become a tradition and Gore took as a given that both candidates would accept them.

He proposed debating Bush "anytime, anywhere" in addition to the Commission debates. Also adding to the Gore argument was the fact that there was no credible reason for Bush not to do the Commission debates.

It was argued that Bush wanted formats more amenable to his casual style, but was countered when the Gore camp pointed out that the Commission debates were purposefully set up to accommodate various styles of debating. One debate would be podium style (considered to favor Gore), one would be conversational (considered to favor Bush) and the other would be a "town hall" format.

The polls showed Gore winning the "debate over the debates" because making Gore out to be a liar wasn't working for Bush (who has himself gone back on his pledge not to be the first to resort to negative personal attacks by approving the "remote control" add).

Gore was successful in making Bush look like he was afraid to debate.

That is exactly what Novak told us Bush shouldn't do. Bush received criticism from fellow Republicans who said the squabbling was hurting him. Last week the Bush team backed off and will most likely do at least two of the three Commission debates.

Nobel Prize winner endures struggle

By Amanda Kaufman

A Burmese freedom fighter and winner of the 1991 Nobel Peace prize has been the topic of heated debate in Myanmar (formerly Burma) as well as in Europe and the United States. Aung Sung Suu Kyi, daughter of the late General Aung San, was recently forced to return to her home in Yangon after a nine-day roadside standoff.

Not discouraged by her first failed attempt, she recently was halted again on August 24, 2000 as she headed out of Yangon to meet with NLD members. With ample food, water, and supplies, she was prepared to stay on the side of the road until the government allowed her to pass.

The standoff ended after nine days when two hundred riot police raided the roadside convoy, forcing Suu Kyi to return to her Yangon home.

This "home," however, was reportedly bolted shut and padlocked from the outside. No one has been allowed to enter or leave the party leaders' homes and their telephone lines have all been cut. The party's headquarters has been closed since police raided and searched it early last Saturday.

In 1998, she attempted to leave Yangon to meet with NLD officials, but military officers stopped her car at the city border. After a standoff lasting several days, the officials escorted her back to her Yangon home. The daughter of two major figures in Burmese politics, Suu Kyi has had a lifetime of experience with the Burmese fight for democracy.

Her father founded the Anti-Fascist People's League, which led the struggle for the country's independence. He was assassinated when she was only two years old. Her mother, the Burmese Ambassador to India and Nepal, raised her.

Suu Kyi studied politics at Delhi University. She received a Bachelor of Arts in philosophy, politics and economics from St. Hugh's College, Oxford University in 1967.

From 1967 until 1971, she held the positions of Assistant Secretary to the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions in the United Nations Secretariat in New York and Research Officer in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Bhutan. In 1972 she married Dr. Michael Aris, a British scholar.

In September of 1988 Suu Kyi formed the National League for Democracy (NLD), of which she became General Secretary. The NLD is primarily concerned with defeating the military State Law and Order Restoration Council (SLORC), which killed several thousand democracy supporters when it regained control

For the next thirteen years Suu Kyi spent her time being a wife and a mother. Ironically, it was her devotion to her family that eventually led her back to politics. In March of 1988, Suu Kyi returned to Burma to care for her ailing mother.

Shortly after, General Ne Win stepped down as Chairman of the Burma Socialist Programme Party after twenty-six years. This event caused students and other Burmese to demonstrate against the twenty-six-year-old one-party socialist government and to speak out in favor of democracy.

In September of 1988 Suu Kyi formed the National League for Democracy (NLD), of which she became General Secretary. The NLD is primarily concerned with defeating the military State Law and Order Restoration Council (SLORC), which killed several thousand democracy supporters when it regained control

During her imprisonment, Suu Kyi's husband had taken ill. He died of cancer in London after she was released. Suu Kyi was told that if she left Yangon to see her ailing husband and her children, she could never return to her homeland. She remained in Yangon even at the time of Aris's death.

Incidentally, Suu Kyi wrote the speech delivered at the Spring 1999 Bucknell commencement. For the same reason, Suu Kyi could not come and deliver her speech in person.

The U.S. State Department said in a statement that it deplored and condemned the efforts to restrict Suu Kyi. It said, "The refusal of Burmese (Myanmar) authorities to allow Aung San Suu Kyi to travel violates international human rights instruments, which guarantee freedom of movement." The EU, Canada, and Thailand issued similar statements.

Zimbabwe rocked by onslaught of political corruption

By Michael Boland

Add Zimbabwe to the list of African nations being torn apart by racism and blatant political exploitation of class envy.

Zimbabwean President Robert Mugabe is overseeing a massive land redistribution program that is creating constitutional crisis, crippling an already-devastated national economy, and pitting blacks against whites—all in the name of social justice.

A British company founded the colony of Rhodesia, the future Zimbabwe, in 1889, and for years whites and blacks co-existed peacefully. It was not until 1980 that all British ties were severed, following a bloody insurrection. As the final British presence was expelled from Zimbabwe, the white settlers who had been operating a minority government agreed to multiracial elections.

In a landslide, Robert Mugabe was elected president, and has remained in power ever since. But years of Mugabe's often-Marxist policies have led to economic stagnation, mainly affecting Zimbabwe's black majority. Unemployment in Zimbabwe is near 50%, and inflation runs as high as 70%.

Landless blacks are frustrated. They see little hope of economic advancement, and all the while, white landed farmers, descended from colonists, are enjoying decent prosperity. Such unrest has mobilized a (racially mixed) opposition party, and Mugabe's political power has been slipping over the course of the past year. It is against this political backdrop that Mugabe has offered his radical land redistribution program.

The plan is simple: white farmers lose the rights to their land. They must, by order of the national government, turn over the rights to the farm to the state; no questions asked, and without compensation.

Mugabe has promised to redistribute the land among poor, landless blacks, as a means to economic advancement. His explanation for the sudden use of force against whites is very simple: white farmers' ancestors "stole" their land from native blacks long ago, and it must now be retaken in the name of restorative justice and economic equality.

Mugabe argues that it is fundamentally unfair that 4,500 white farmers should own 1/3 of the nation's arable land; many outside observers accuse Mugabe of shamelessly pandering to the poor, for political gain.

Eviction and redistribution have hardly been orderly. Since April, roving bands of marauders have terrorized white farmers, killing as many as 19, beating dozens of others, and forcibly expelling hundreds more from their homes.

Rapes and robberies have become almost commonplace, and often go unpunished. Worse, these actions come with the backing and Technology stocks fall below expectations

By Tom Elliott

The speculation hovering over the technology sector of the stock market intensified recently as they took a plunge last week amid worries of corporate profits. However, this is being viewed as temporary and isn't necessarily scaring people away from investing.

The gold rush for these stocks was caused in part by the lofty predictions made back in March. These valuations have been readjusted and now appear to be more on track, still attracting investors. The problem began when the attempts at placing valuations came through untraditional means, in accordance with the "new economy."

The recent price drops are visible in the NASDAQ Composite Index, the exchange that holds most tech-oriented stocks. The index slumped below the 4,000 level for the first time in since mid-August, dented by weakness in computer and semi-conductor shares.

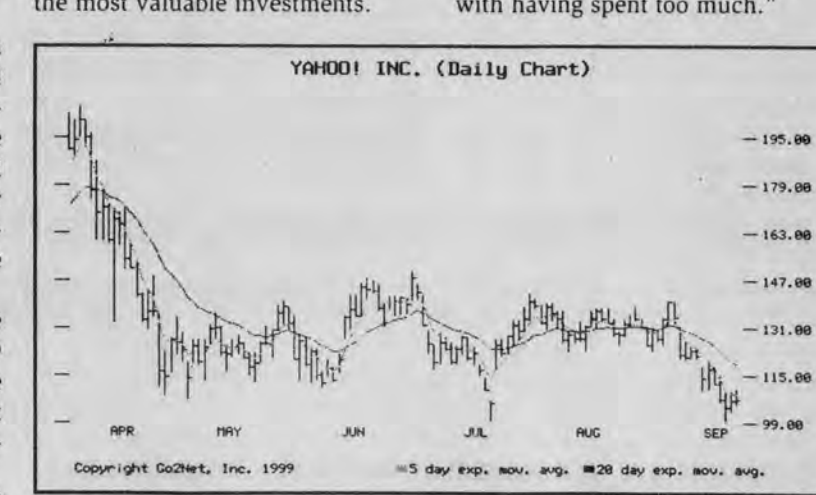

The NASDAQ Index stumbled 119.9 points (nearly three percent) lower to 3,978.41. The index also finished a holiday-shortened week with a loss of 255 points (six percent) putting it back into negative territory.

"The market in recent days is basically reflecting the fact that surging profits are no longer a given, as the economy is slowing," said Primate Decision Economics' senior economist Pierre Ellis.

Big computer-related companies such as Oracle, Juniper Networks and Cisco Systems both combined to help bring down the NASDAQ into negative territory. They shot down $4-10/16 to $36-9/16, $17-1/4 to $19-5/8, and $2-3/8 to $63-7/8 respectively.

Several heavy-hitters helped bring down the New York Stock Exchange as well-IBM and Intel slipped $3-7/8 to $129-1/2 and $2-1/16 to $65-3/8, respectively.

This downward trend comes after a major growth period in August. September also carries with it the tradition of being the stock market's worst month. This has analysts looking to the future, untainted by last week's wobbly performance, wondering which tech stocks will be the most valuable investments.

even the endorsement of President Mugabe, who has encouraged white farmers to pack up their things and leave the country, if they're unhappy.

Some farmers will not be moved, however, and have sought legal remedy. They have little to show for their efforts. While Zimbabwe's highest court has ruled that the police must protect white's farms, and evict squatters (bandits living on other people's land), the executive branch of the government has refused to comply.

The police, in fact, often encourage the squatters. And having declared whites "enemies of the state" on national television in April, protection from gangs of poor bandits

Investors are confident that the Federal Reserve will not change interest rates again this year, which should help stocks rise as normal while interest rates are stable. Moreover, some are looking towards the next step-for inflation-fighting central bankers to start reducing the cost of borrowing money.

Hank Paulson, chief executive of Goldman Sachs, described the tech stock sector as a "winner take all" game. Many of these highly appraised companies will live up to their tremendous expectations, leaving others to value below these valuations.

Investors abandoned the old economy's typical investing strategies and have begun investing on supply and demand and investor sentiment, similar to that of commodities and not traditional equities. These are called growth stocks instead of value stocks. Investors realized the broad power and importance of the Internet and were looking to find the next Microsoft, Cisco, Intel, Dell or Sun.

"We have seen a significant adjustment in both the technology and Internet sector without a major impact on the rest of the market," Paulson said. He continued, "We have also seen a major readjustment of valuations within the technology and Internet sectors favoring the big companies which are either profitable or close to profitable over some of the smaller, more risky companies."

As these tech stocks continue to be re-valued more consideration will be incorporated. The future evaluations of initial public offerings (IPO's) will be more disciplined and based more on the expected earnings and business models and less about the hype.

The winners of the respective markets, the next Microsoft's, Cisco's, Dell's and Sun's will be the most profitable equities. However, these are going to be the most expensive investments. Is it worth the price?

Right now, there is not enough political pressure on Mugabe to force him to obey the courts and induce the police to uphold the law.

Mugabe's populist promise of "land for all" seems to be working with voters, and he is regaining his political strength. Promises of future riches for the masses give Mugabe tremendous political cover, and considerable leeway in his dealings with the rights of the white minority.

As long as police forces remain loyal, Mugabe will probably continue to ignore the courts and redistribute white farmer's land, with no compensation or protection, over the objections of an increasingly helpless and terrified minority.

Langone, Rooke, Weis.
These three names seem to adorn nearly half the major buildings on campus, but not without reason. These families' contributions to the University have led to the construction and remodeling of many important fixtures on campus. Such has been a trend in campus history: the most significant gift wins title rights to the newest facility. The question now is whether this trend will continue as the New Dorn awaits its name.

As opposed to extending the rights to the next individual who offers a major donation, however, perhaps the University could take this opportunity to consider other options.

While dubbing a building with a wealthy donor's name may be a just expression of gratitude for their generosity, there are other parties who may be unable to offer an exorbitant amount of money but are equally deserving of the honor. Recognizing these individuals would convey the message that monetary donations are certainly not the only means of bettering the University.

Intellectual and administrative contributions are primary examples of areas that deserve recognition. The University has benefited from the services of many talented administrators through the years. For example, why not rename the New Dorn for someone like John Zeller '41, a Lewisburg resident who served formerly as chief financial officer and general counsel and still serves as a University trustee.

Such a practice is not rare on campus—Swartz Hall's four sections were renamed for the University's first four presidents.

Ken Langone '57, who most recently donated $11 million toward the new aquatic complex, named the new aquatic complex after friend and Capital Campaign Chairman Art Kinney '56.

Should the University decide to continue with the practice of offering name rights to wealthy contributors, we must wonder who will step forward in the future. Could a corporation gain campus facilities in their namesake? In such a scenario, the meaning and relevance to Bucknell could no longer be present.

While we appreciate the gracious donations of our numerous benefactors, The Bucknellian believes the University should seek to honor its most outstanding contributor, not necessarily its highest donor.

Bucknellian editors apologize for poor distribution

To all subscribers and members of the Bucknell community:

With the beginning of each semester comes a certain degree of difficulty. The most glaring example of this was certainly in our distribution—or lack thereof—of our first issue.

The Bucknellian editorial staff would like to apologize to all those who did not receive a copy of the first issue. The entire staff accepts full blame for this mishap. The problem resulted from some poor planning and miscommunication between different constituencies on and off campus.

We guarantee that all subscribers will receive copies of both the first and second issues in the coming days. The staff will be picking up extra copies of the first issue for distribution throughout campus. We ask that any faculty, staff and administration members that desire a copy please contact us as soon as possible. We will work our hardest to deliver these copies directly to your offices.

All distribution problems should be fully remedied this week. We are happy to announce the hiring of a new circulation manager, Brian Klotz,

Should campaign finance be in an issue in Election 2000? Yes No

By Ryan Delahanty

With the presidential election two months away, interest in the presidential race is continuing to increase dramatically. As happens every four years there has been a call for campaign finance reform. Many critics abhor the deep pockets of America's two leading parties, the Republicans and Democrats. People like Ralph Nader, frontrunner of the Green Party, publicly denounce the huge donations made by corporations to "compromise" party nominees. Instead Nader suggests that races should be publicly funded so that all parties have an equal chance to represent themselves because as of now Nader and others like him, say Pat Buchanan of the Reform Party, cannot match the amount of money that Gore and Bush spend on their campaigns.

Campaign finance reform can bring equality not only to the presidential race but also the senatorial, gubernatorial, and congressional races. As the importance grows (going from local to federal obviously) so too does the disparity between opponent's cash flow. This results in an unfair advantage for people like Bush and Gore (at least for this election) who are able to get the "big money" donations from the "rubber chicken" dinners and "$1,000 desserts". People like Ralph Nader, who refuse to play the "money game" (he likes to coach "just like the rest of the normal Americans") are unable to be even taken seriously because they don't have the commercial time nor the cover-

In a world where one of George Bush's ads that reads DEMOCRATS supposedly subliminally flashes the word RATS gets more coverage than when Nader tries to get an ad showing his party's platform, YOU know something is extremely wrong. When Gore and Bush are able to waste millions upon millions of dollars on pointless, ineffective, mudslinging ads you've got to ask yourself why can't we find a better way?

Nader proposes a publicly funded campaign. That way all of the candidates can have the same amount of money and ideally the same chance of winning. Yet, a pub-

Al Gore is in trouble for it and Ralph Nader uses it as the focal point of his campaign—but what really is campaign finance reform? More importantly, do we really need it?

Proponents of campaign finance reform charge that in today's elections the candidate with the most money wins. This is often true. And to that I say—is it necessarily bad?

When politicians give speeches and hold fundraisers, they try and impress their potential donors by passionately speaking about the central principles of their platforms.

nance reformers want is the prevention of large corporations or lobbyist groups from making substantial donations to politicians, especially presidential candidates.

The argument is that if one industry donates enough they can "own" a candidate and, once that candidate is elected he or she will do whatever the industry wants them to do.

And I do believe that that is a real threat—it is important that once an official is elected he or she acts in the best interest of the country, state, county, etc. and not a special interest group. But what can we change to?

The average private citizen cannot, contrary to what Ralph Nader thinks, finance a political campaign. And there will always be the Ross Perot's and the George W. Bush's—private citizens that can finance a campaign.

If Clinton and Dole were not able to accept industry donations, Ross Perot would have been president.

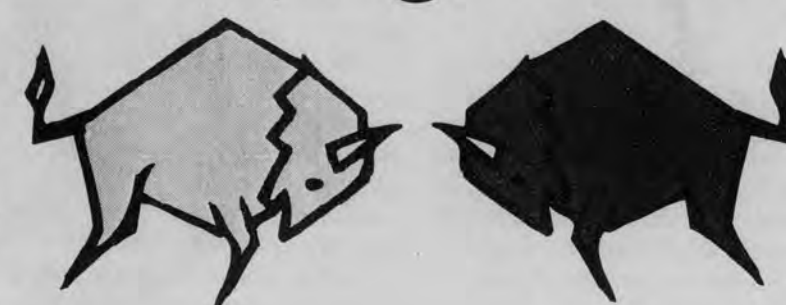

At the present time, politicians can accept donations from industries and private donors, but only up to a certain amount. Each political party can also use money to endorse candidates but all campaign material must be for the party and not a particular individual.

These rules are confusing but they are the best—the only ones we have.

Until there is a fair, uniform way to give money to candidates (no industry donations but not privately funded campaigns either) the present system is the best one.

lly funded campaign is also an ideal not a reality. There is no way that the Republicans nor the Democrats will yield their advantage they have over everyone else. If they are able to capitalize over the other parties, then why would they vote for something that would potentially take them out of power.

One assumes that, the more passionate and appealing a politician is, the more money they will receive. Following the logic then, the most passionate candidate gets the most money, the candidate with the most money wins so therefore the most passionate candidate wins.

It's not a laughing matter

Poor language counteracts strides toward tolerance, highlights hypocrisy

By Katie Hays

"Yo, that movie was so gay."

Before reacting to this comment just for a moment pretend that you are a first time visitor to the U.S., equipped with only a literal understanding of the English language.

You and a friend are strolling out of the Campus Theater, having just seen what is possibly the worst movie of all time. You're thinking that the English word "bad" would be an apt description, but instead your American friend not only seems to have assigned the movie a gender, but also to have indicated the movie's sexual preference for similarly-engendered movies. "But," you muse, "I thought that the English language doesn't assign gender to nouns."

So all of your foreign language studies amount to this? No, wait. You can solve this. If "movie" = "bad," and "gay" = "movie," then "gay" = "bad." Finally, your mathematics skills have provided some insight into linguistic meaning: a true revelation. And so, "gay" is bad and all it makes perfect sense.

But not really. It seems that often we engage in class discussions of ideas ranging from sustainability to tolerance, then leave those class discussions to drive SUVs while calling one another "gay." We are perhaps not only a bubble, but also a mecca for hypocrisy.

"But it's not our fault," we protest. "It's our culture. We didn't create this lifestyle or the vocabulary that we use. We're not trying to be negative."

Regardless of our intentions, we (as a university and as a country) host a great number of homophobic and intolerant attitudes.

In defense of the equation "gay" = "bad," someone may say, "I don't mean that homosexuality is bad; I just picked up the expression somewhere."

This is true. And if the expression was simply "picked up," then it could also be discarded. There are also, however, those who may excuse their negativity (or blatant homophobia) with the words, "That's what I learned at home." The church teaches that gays are wrong, or, "I don't know, I just have this sick feeling about gays."

That "feeling" is a product of our culture. If we are all products of our culture, are we simply mindless robots? Are we therefore accountable for our lack of acceptance, or for any of our actions, for that matter?

No, for if we were mindless robots propelled by our culture, slavery would remain and women would not vote; such changes are the results of the few individuals with the strength to step back from their culture and to examine their actions and values. These individuals ask, "Why?"

We might ask "why" in relation to homophobia and intolerance, but then why do we continue to substitute the word "gay" for all things negative?

We do not know, but somehow a few of us refuse to adopt both the word usage and the general fearful attitude towards homosexuals, one individual on campus comes to mind. He is, in my opinion, one of the most thoughtful, interesting and intelligent members of the student body, evidenced by both his refusal to taunt and his open-minded acceptance. On his dorm room door, a small "Safe Zone" sign indicates that openness.

This weekend, he found that his door's "Safe Zone" sign read, "DEATH ZONE" and its pink triangle had been scribbled into a black Star of David.

But Bucknell students are not haters. Because a person sets himself apart from the others, does not choose to conform, or prefers a certain way of life, the similar-minded masses of our culture jeer. But we, as individuals and not as the mindless mass, can abstain from ridiculing.

We can ask ourselves, "Why do we use the word 'gay' to describe a movie that we don't like, a shirt we won't wear, or a bad suggestion?" Are we consciously trying to link "gay" to "bad"? And if so, why?

This linkage alone is not the source of all wrongs; it is only a small part of a far larger ideology towards those who are different. Our lives are short, and yet we fill them with petty hatred that causes horrible discomfort and often drives people to suicide. I cannot imagine a person regretting his own positivity or openness; more often, people live to regret their affiliation with the opposite.

We can say nothing to the undergraduates who have internalized some anti-gay message. We cannot accuse or turn negative, but can struggle to understand. We have the capacity to think and to question, and to change our own behavior.

When questioned as to the reason for a hateful action, an antagonist's reply is often the same five-word phrase that we hear echoing across the backdrop of third grade playgrounds: "Can't you take a joke?"

We see the victims and the antagonists every day and the lines often blur between the two; still, our vocabulary and actions can define us as antagonists regardless of our intentions. Small talk or choice of vocabulary can become significant when it drives someone towards his dreams, or to despair. We have power. So how can we live here at Bucknell, or anywhere for that matter? We could easily form a group of shared ignorance, defend personal propriety (or minds), and laugh amongst ourselves at some private joke. We could also step back and think of the alternatives: to think, to question our actions and to struggle to change minor "equivalence-slips." But even as we begin to question, the more hurtful attacks of lifestyle will continue; and when we react to those actions, we will continue to hear the same question, droning and skipping like a broken record:

"Can't you take a joke?" Sure. We all like to laugh.

Do we buy Britney's 'organic' experience?

"Creative" advertising replaces quality products with entertainment value

By Kristen Jancuk

Flipping through a new issue of Cosmo last night, I realized two things: (1) the only people who can afford the Prada and Gucci clothes the magazine loves to gush about have way better things to do with their time than read Cosmo and (2) advertising is getting out of hand, not just in magazines, but television as well.

I'm sure you've all heard the racket about the latest George W. Bush ad campaign. The carefully crafted 30-second commercial condemning Al Gore's prescription drug plan apparently contains some subliminal, or not so subliminal, messages. The word "rats" flashes on the screen for, and I quote, 1/30 of a second, until it becomes "bureaucrats," a cheap shot at the democrats.

There are, as I see it, two possibilities. The people managing Bush's campaign are either (a) incompetent or (b) half-witted. Bush's defense is that this was not intended to be subliminal message, it's just a mistake. That's one awfully big mistake. Don't you pay these people to ensure that things like this don't happen? Maybe you're not paying them enough.

Then there's option B. Perhaps this was intended to be a subliminal message. Apparently Bush's advertisers just aren't very good at it. Subliminal messages have to be just that: subliminal. They won't work if everyone can see exactly what you're trying to do and call you on it.

to do with whatever product they were endorsing? Ads for running shoes showed people running; ads for cars showed people driving. All this seems to have changed. I spend more time in front of the TV trying to figure out the commercials than actually watching the shows.

My favorite one begins with the song "Louie, Louie" playing and the words "No one actually knows the words to this song" on the screen. Then various phrases of gibberish flash on the screen as the song continues to play. What is this commercial for? GEICO auto insurance. Oh, obviously. These are about as connected as frogs, lizards, ferrets and beer.

Celebrity endorsements have always been around, but I would like to know just how much of an affect this has on consumers. When I see Britney Spears' smiling face in an Herbal Essence's add I don't suddenly think, "Wow, I bet if I use Herbal Essences I'll look just like Britney." The only thing that would make me look more like Britney are breast implants and Justin Timberlake drooling at my feet. What I am thinking is "All the shampoo and product endorsements in the world will not cover up the fact that you can't sing and dance at the same time."

Am I going to buy Pepsi because it makes Sisco fly through air in an intergalactic party? Probably not. Do I think wearing Gap clothes will improve my ability to sing and dance in unison with my friends? Hardly. The truth is that all these subliminal messages, celebrity endorsements and endorsing yet unrelated commercials are insulting our intelligence and trying to trick or coerce us into buying a less than worthy product because of an attractive package.

Will a delay better the Palestinian situation?

By Gretchen Schrock

In a story all too familiar, the hopes and dreams of an entire nation of people were put on hold Sunday as the Palestinian Central Council postponed a declaration of statehood and recommitted to the Middle East peace effort, which is still entrenched in the mire of stalled negotiations. Originally the group pledged to declare an independent Palestinian state no later than Sept. 13. Instead, they adjourned for a couple of months and left the prospect of statehood to the care of Yasser Arafat and his retinue of advisors.

Maybe this was not the best decision considering that the international community is financially emerging the state and that Arafat traveled the world in search of moderate support for the deadline and returned with only failure. Since one course of action is not full of promise, the Palestinians have decided for the recurring role for so long has time being to try another that may secure peace but, in the past, has been unsuccessful.

What makes the Palestinians think that a peace deal with the Israelis has a better chance of occurring than the declaration of their own state? Both are unrealistic dreams. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak, speaking on ABC night television in New York, said that he would welcome the delay even though he entertained "no illusions" about securing a final peace deal that would end 52 years of violence and hatred in the region. Furthermore, the Palestinians tried to cast their decision as forward thinking and not defensive.

If the Palestinians did declare their own state, there would undoubtedly be repercussions from the Israeli front, which would feel very threatened by the presence of another Islamic state. "Our right to declare a state is purely a matter of what? Care of who? Palestinian decision," Nabil Shaath, a senior official said. "The delay serves to give peace yet another chance, and it is not for any fear of reprisals by anyone." Instead of hearing words of support from the major world powers, notably the United States, they would be hearing words of criticism.

It must be admitted that the delay serves to give peace yet another chance, and it is not for any fear of reprisals by anyone. Instead of hearing words of support from the major world powers, notably the United States, they would be hearing words of criticism.

By Matthew Hinson

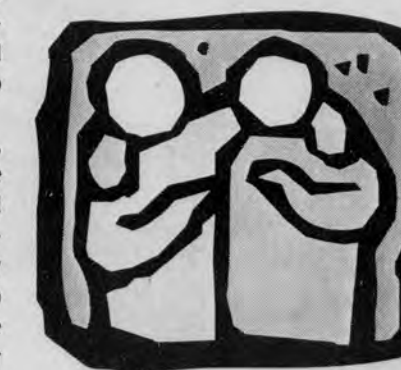

Welcome to my fellow members of the class of 2004. Well, it's been two weeks. What have we learned so far? First, that we have entered the Bucknell Bubble, from which there are few escapes. Secondly, and perhaps more importantly, that fall in central Pennsylvania produces weather that is worse than unpredictable. We've all learned how to do laundry and that the machines can and do eat your money sometimes. We've discovered that the food at the caf is good, but soon gets repetitive. Also, despite, or perhaps because of being in a small town, people drive way too fast through campus.

But, more importantly, we've learned what it is to be a member of the Bucknell community, and that the current members are usually quite friendly and willing to help you out—whether that be finding a class, an activity or a party. Also, we've discovered that living on your own is pretty cool. The professors seem ready and willing to help you, and, even more importantly, seem to know exactly what they're doing.

The best thing I've noticed since coming here is that, as a freshman class, we seem to have unity. Just last night, I joined in a pickup Ultimate Frisbee game in the Smith Quad with a few people that I knew, but most of which I did not.

Having entered the Bubble I have discovered, and I hope my classmates find the same thing, that this is a superb place to learn, both academically and about oneself. This Bubble removes us from the "real" world, allowing us to form ourselves as we see fit, with fewer outside influences. How many times have I heard during the last two weeks, "I haven't watched TV since I've got here" or "I wonder what's been going on in the world since we've gotten here?"

And so, to the class of 2004, I wish you the best of luck. I hope to be able to meet the 850 or so of you that I have not yet at some point in the next four years. We all have great potential, and we are fortunate to go to a university in which this potential can be realized, and at a time in history when this potential can be tapped.

Staff Profile: Sharon Gearhart

University favorite loves all her kids, greets all with a smile and friendly hello

By Sarah Gudenkauf

One of the most well-known faces of the University's support staff belongs to Sharon Gearhart. Most likely she has swiped your card at the Bostwick Cafeteria, bantered with you about the weather or offered you her bright smile on a rough morning. We all know her, and she is, perhaps, one of the few people on campus who can honestly say that she has seen nearly every one of us at least once.

When asked about her relations with students, she replies without hesitation: "I love you kids. I always have, from day one."

"Day one" for Sharon was 23 years ago when she began working in the University Prep. Kitchen, preparing all of the ingredients that the cooks need for each day's meals. Three years ago, Sharon began working her more visible post next to the Roy G. Bostwick Cafeteria entrance. There, she greets students and swipes their cards while keeping track of the number of students dining at every meal. This count, in turn, helps the kitchen to decide how much lasagna or chicken to make the next time that item appears on the menu.

Even on the day that Sharon started working in the cafeteria, the University was a familiar place to her. She had visited the campus many times as a child because several of her family members have worked in food service; Sharon recounts tales of coming to help her grandmother when she was young.

Her grandmother worked at the College Inn, which was an alternative to the dining hall similar to the Bison. Sharon also had an aunt who worked in dining halls for more than 30 years at the University as well as in other locations.

Sharon's love for what she does is evident in the grin that spreads across her face whenever she talks about students. "I'm the only woman I know who has 800 children and never gave birth," she says. "I give them advice. If they're sick, I tell them to go to the doctor or I remind them to drink lots of fluids. I just really like my job, and I really like my kids."

Sharon has made an impact that varies from student to student; most of us have memories of an especially hectic or an impossibly bad day when Sharon's presence at the dining hall provided temporary relief. With stress compounding and exhaustion imminent, the simple sight of Sharon's vibrant smile works wonders. When commented on her power to cheer, however, Sharon insists that she doesn't do anything special: "I just do my job."

Some would say the smile is beyond the job description, but Sharon defines her job differently. She feels that it is important to make every student feel welcome and at home: "If I treat you right, you'll treat me right. I try to be pleasant, I try to smile, I try to say hello to everybody and I try to say goodbye to everybody. You kids are here and you are away from your families. I've seen a lot of really long faces coming in the doors and a lot of times if you just look at someone and smile and say hello, it makes them feel a little better."

Her philosophy has earned her many friends among the student body. She may not be able to remember the names of all of the students that she sees every day, but she always remembers their faces. "I'll be in town with my mom and this group of kids will walk past and smile and say hello and I'll say hello back, and my mom will ask, 'Who's that?' Well, I don't know, but it's one of my kids. It's a group of my kids. You guys are my kids."

In June, Sharon received proof of how much she is appreciated by students, colleagues and other University staff. She was one of three recipients of the Zeller Support Staff Excellence Award. In the spring semester, students and staff were asked to nominate members of the support staff whom they believed make outstanding contributions to the University. Sharon, whose outstanding contributions are ev-

Wink Thinks

Dear Wink,

I realize that I have only been on this campus for a few weeks, being a freshman, and all, but even in my short while here I feel as though I am so overwhelmed. I see all these people here who seem as though they are so determined and know exactly what they want to do. For instance, I was trying to hit on a girl the other day so I asked her what her major was just to try and make some small talk because I wasn't just going to bust out and ask her if she wanted to go out sometime. So she starts telling me how she is biochemistry major and how she is planning to go to medical school to become an abdominal muscle tissue repair specialist.

After she told me this I was utterly stupefied. I don't even know what a muscle tissue repair specialist is, let alone one that likes to work on the abdomen. So I told her that I was a religion major and that one day I would start my own religion and call it what on earth am I going to do with my life? To get to the point, I really have no direction in my life.

I came to college because it wasn't really an option—my parents went to college and have doctorates, so naturally I had to go as well. The thing is that I just don't know how you can pinpoint what you want to do with the rest of your life after knowing absolutely nothing about the real world. To tell the truth, all I really want to do is go out and have fun—I'll do anything if I haven't done it before and it looks like a good time.

As a result of all of these feelings I have I just don't know if college is right for me at this point in my life. How do I decide, and more importantly, how do I get some direction in my life?

Sincerely,
Wasting My Parents Money

Dear Wasting My Parents Money,

Let me start off by telling you that I am all about having a good time—it is my quest in life. If something just looks like it's boring, count me out. That being said, I totally understand where you are "coming from." I remember my days when I was a freshman managing major thinking that I would have my own company some day!

Turns out, after taking Accounting, I decided that I was going to be the manager of Wendy's one day! So what should you take from this? Just know that you don't have to know what you are going to do in your life—it's not really a big deal because you can change your major five times before you finally decide, so don't sweat it.

To be completely honest with

you, I think that if you go into college knowing exactly what you want to do, you probably won't get as much out of your experience. Take some pointless classes, do something fun—it shouldn't be about the people who are all about saving the world the minute they get to college.

You know who I am talking about—some people you just don't even want to talk to, and you see them and you are thinking, what is wrong with you? So that is my justification for not having a sense of direction. However, you also have to realize that what you learn in school isn't what you are going to do in the real world. A real simple equation for you to learn is that Bucknell classes don't equal real world jobs.

Therefore, your major probably isn't what you are going to do for the rest of your life, at least you should hope it isn't. You should just go and take interesting classes and somewhere along the way you will find your niche, and from that niche you will get your direction.

Don't say that college isn't for you. The truth of the matter is that it's for everyone. Learning is a lifelong process; it doesn't stop after high school, or after college. Basically what I am trying to get across is that I urge you to go out and have your good times, take some classes, and in time you will find what you want to do. At least I hope that is the case.

So what, you say, is the moral of this story? Go out, have some good times and don't stress over your classes too much. After all, this whole experience of college is supposed to be the best time of your life.

Since its arrival, Rita's Italian Ice has taken its place among Lewisburg's cold dessert competition, but does it have what it takes to stack up to the Freeze? Let's let the battle begin.

Serving both hard ice cream and 24 flavors of soft serve since 1990, the Freeze offers an impressive variety of ice creams for the sugar connoisseur to sample. Besides the overwhelming variety of soft serve flavors, the Freeze is famous for its specialty—appropriately called the "Freezies," which is a delectable whirlwind (comparable to Dairy Queen's "Blizzards") of soft serve and "your favorite trimmings," (ranging from Peppermint Patty pieces, to fresh fruit, to cookie dough chunks). Moreover, the Freeze's prices are reasonable, a leading factor in its popularity with those of us living on a more limited budget.

A "small" sized ice cream (such a title is deceiving, because a small is actually a towering four-inch swirl of creaminess atop a cake cone) is only $1.75.

For 10 years, the Lewisburg Freeze has provided Bucknell students and Lewisburg citizens alike with that cold and creamy summer tradition: ice cream.

This past June, however, a newcomer arrived in Lewisburg to challenge the reign of the Freeze as Dessert Diva.

An abroad perspective: Kenya

By Andrew Kohn

My abroad experience began with a scorpion, a pair of pants and a vervet monkey. I believe I can confidently say that I am the only Bucknell student who faced this daunting trio just a little over 24 hours after entering my host country.

It all began while I was showering. A vervet monkey leapt out of a tree hanging over the shower and began to chase me. In the middle of the common area, suddenly aware of my naked state, I grabbed my pants and threw them on. In the rush, however, I didn't follow the number one rule: SHAKE OUT YOUR PANTS! I started to put them on and found a scorpion crawling up the pant leg into which I was about to put my vulnerable leg.

I could be nowhere else but Kenya.

For the first part of the semester I lived outside of Nairobi, the nation's capital, with 20 other American students. I would wake up in the morning to the sound of the breakfast bell and would fall asleep each night to the screaming of the tree hyrax. The ranch I lived in was fenced so I was able to walk or run at any time of day and see herds of zebra, eland or gazelle.

The second part of my semester was spent in southern Kenya. I lived with the Maasai and woke up every morning to the beautiful sight of Mt. Kilimanjaro rising over the grassland. I learned so much about a culture that has gone virtually untouched by civilization for centuries. But slowly their way of life is changing.

The giraffe were always present as well as the ostrich and oryx that visited camp. The animals on the ranch were killed periodically to produce meat for restaurants and other businesses in and around Nairobi.

It was most dramatically demonstrated one day when we were driving into town. We came across a woman with a sick baby. The rains had come early and many babies were succumbing to pneumonia. This particular baby was showing the early stages of his illness and could be made better with the necessary medicine. This medicine, however, was 15 miles away in town and the mother had started walking there early in the morning. Modern medicine is available only if the sick are able to walk the distance required to get there.

Some of the most memorable things that have ever occurred to me happened in Africa. One night, while sleeping in Maasai Mara National Park, I heard the call of a hyena just a few feet from my tent. All I could remember was the day before we had been told to keep our tents closed because hyenas go for the face. The next night I awoke to the sound of two male elephants trumpeting close to our campsite. A friend said that she had felt something rub up against her outside her tent during one of the nights. What was it? Who knows? That's part of the fun.

I spent time camping in Amboseli National Park and Tsavo West National Park, as well as the Maasai Mara. The average American thinks of the parks in Africa as pristine places where man can get close to a wild animal. This, however, is not what you really see. Human settlements surround the parks, meaning that they require heavy management in order to keep the animals in balance. The animals you see are conditioned to the noise and sight of cars and people, lacking the wild edge.

The landscapes are beautiful, if managed properly, and decimated if left to the forces of nature. Visitors drive off-road, destroying necessary plant life and harassing animals. Cheetahs are declining in parks because they need to hunt during the day, but with endless amounts of vehicles following them from sunrise to sunset, they have no time to hunt. Safaris are not the idealized journeys into Eden as many believe.

In one park, I almost stepped on a forest cobra. I also had two very poisonous snakes, a black mamba and a forest viper. I was bitten by a tsetse fly, the bearer of sleeping sickness, and picked one too many ticks off my body. But for all of these close calls, I wouldn't change anything. The rewards of Africa far outweighed any dangers that I may have encountered along the way.

I went to Africa to learn about wildlife management firsthand and came back with this goal fulfilled and many unexpected windows opened for me as well. I learned about the complexity of conservation in Africa. The delicate balance between people and animals that had existed for thousands of years has been stretched to the point where everything may be lost. I have been to an elephant orphanage where 20 babies, no bigger than two feet tall, were running around in mud pools, their mothers and families killed by poachers. I went to a chimpanzee sanctuary where chimps, their mothers killed, lived inside areas surrounded by an electric fence never again to roam free. And then there are the people.

Unable to make a living selling cattle as they had always done, they try farming. The land, however, is arid and not able to support farming and subsequently all of their crops fail. With no money and desperate for food, they enter into illegal practices or their families suffer. The government, because of corruption, bribery and lack of funds, is powerless to help these people. How can you then tell these people that they need to leave land with water open for animals and that they can't kill an animal for food? These are problems that Americans don't think of when they say they want to save the elephant or the cheetah.

Much of what I learned can be depressing. But I just think of the time a bat landed on a friend's face or when I saw a lioness and her two cubs sleeping comfortably together and then everything becomes bearable. I wish that everyone could see the things I saw or experience what I did. I wouldn't change anything and if offered the chance again, I would hop on a plane tomorrow.

A capella groups add new faces, new songs

The Silhouettes

By Meghan Magee

The Silhouettes, the University's only female a cappella group, are ready for one of their strongest years.

After losing four seniors last year and with Beth Van Epps '02 spending this year abroad, the Silhouettes held auditions at the beginning of the semester. They accepted four new members, all first-year students; they are Jenny Cardona, Kim Hallman, Kate Palumbo and Courtney Carlson. The Silhouettes also welcome back the voices of Kate Marr '01, Diana Schmidt '01 and Brett Russo '01, who spent last spring abroad.

Musical director Meghan Murphy '02 anticipates a wonderful year for the 12 Silhouettes as they expand their repertoire, which consists of a few more oldies like "Build Me Up Buttercup" and recent hits including Dave Matthews' "Say Goodbye" and Faith Hill's "Breathe."

The musically talented Sarah Mastrom '03 is responsible for the arrangement of several songs, and many others share their musical creativity to arrange as well. The Silhouettes follow a rigorous schedule in the fall, practicing four to five times a week in preparation for Christy's, the annual a cappella sell-out for fall Parents' Weekend.

Mastroni said, "With the addition of new members, the sound of the group is very strong, and I am looking forward to a new year for us. We are trying very hard to learn many new songs that we hope will please the crowd at Christy's and future performances."

For those fans that enjoy the traditional songs performed, the groups still plans on singing favorites such as Billy Joel's "For the Longest Time" and Fugees' "Can't Take My Eyes Off of You." Taking into account the group's trademark songs and new arrangements, the Silhouettes will perform a total of eight or nine songs at this year's Christy's event.

In addition to gaining new members and learning new songs, the Silhouettes intend to redesign their website this year. With all of the excitement going on, you'd be remiss not to see what the Silhouettes have in store.

This Parents' Weekend catch the vocal talents of these 12 women at 9 p.m. on Friday or 8 p.m. on Saturday.

The Bison Chips

By Meghan Magee

The all-male a cappella group, the Bison Chips, predicts an exciting year.

With the addition of three new members, Pablo Gousmand '04, Rene Foucault '04 and Steve McCormick '04, the Bison Chips plan to "push the social envelope," says senior Sean Kirnan.

As usual, the 14-member Bison Chips combine their musical talents with their trademark comedic elements to create spectacular performances.

Now, more so than ever, the group will focus on songs with political implications for the campus community.

Kirnan also said, "It's going to be the good old Chips." The Bison Chips concert will feature their familiar tunes as well as some new ones. Not too worry, the group still plans to perform their classic rendition of "Lady in Red."

Junior Alex McCausland, one of the group's more colorful members, sings a show-stopping Sinatra solo which includes some creative dance moves of his own.

The Bison Chips face a hectic fall season with Christy's rapidly approaching on Friday, Sept. 22, as well as the 25-year reunion during Homecoming weekend in late October.

The Chips have invited former group members, dating from 1974 and onwards, to join them for a weekend of entertainment.

During the reunion event, Bison Chips from all generations will have the opportunity to join in a few songs with the current group in one of the more popular concerts on campus.

The two upcoming Bison Chips performances promise an opportunity for an entertaining evening of humor and talent.

Tickets for Christy's always go fast, and the group expects a full audience for the Oct. 28 homecoming concert, so buy your tickets in advance!

Two Past Midnight

By Lauren Shabab

Somewhere within the Music and Art Building, Two Past Midnight, Bucknell's premier coed a cappella group, spends many a night burning the midnight oil in preparation for another successful year of music and fun.

Two Past Midnight was founded in 1995 as the University's first coed a cappella group, joining the Silhouettes and The Bison Chips, the campus' female and male a cappella groups respectively.

The group is comprised of fun-loving individuals who enjoy singing and delighting their audience with musical talent and spirited antics.

Two Past Midnight, or 2PM, as it is commonly called, began the year with a bang and things continue to look bright for the talented group of fourteen.

The group accepted five new members; Erika Staaf '04, Leslie Shevlin '04, Tim Van Houten '04, Jim Ritter '04 and Nicole D'Aureli '03 joined the nine veteran members at an exciting time. Since the beginning of the year, Two Past Midnight has performed twice during the orientation period and is working on a second CD after the highly successful release of its first self-titled album.

"We are very excited about our new members," said Mark Crawshaw '01, the group's unofficial leader. "They are extremely musically talented and will add a lot to the group." Along with the additional fresh voices, the group is in the process of learning numerous new songs to be debuted at Christy's, a two-night concert, in honor of famous Bucknell alumnus, Christy Mathewson.

This concert features all three of the a cappella groups. Among the line-up of musically diverse old favorites, the group plans to include new songs by 10,000 Maniacs, Phil Collins and other icons of pop-culture.

Crawshaw said "we are really looking forward to Christy's. It'll be a chance to show off what we can do."

Curtis Calderon jazzes up Late Night music series

By Michelle Payne

Get ready for something a little different from the Late Night Music Series. While Friday nights at the 7th Street Café have commonly welcomed folk musicians to campus, this week halts a break in tradition.

At 11 p.m. on Sept. 15, the University will host Curtis Calderon, an accomplished trumpet player who illustrates the art of sweet, southern jazz. Calderon is a native of San Antonio, Texas. Though only 25 years old, he is a professional musician and has been playing music full-time for the past nine years. He has already appeared on an extensive list of recordings, including two of jazz violinist Sebastian Campestre's albums and the Jim Cullum Jazz Band Radio Show on National Public Radio that featured the music of Duke Ellington.

Calderon has traveled on the road as a featured soloist for several popular swing bands, including the Russ Morgan Orchestra, the Jimmy Dorsey Orchestra, the Glenn Miller Orchestra and the Hoagy Carmichael Orchestra. While with the Hoagy Carmichael Orchestra, he was featured doing Louis Armstrong and Bix Beiderbecke solos. In 1994, Calderon played with the Glenn Miller Orchestra in "Glenn Miller's Greatest Hits," a PBS special hosted by Kathie Lee Gifford.

Calderon's first solo album released in 1997, "Only Trust Your Heart," received rave reviews. Rolling Magazine rated his debut as "romantic-touched tunes [that] fill your soul, tempt your heart, make you want to dance, laugh or sing idyllic thoughts. These tunes make you tap your fingers and your toes; they elevate the heart to heaven. It's a sensual CD. Powerful."

The tracks produced by Calderon and performed by his five-piece band are great artists Duke Ellington, Jobim

and Berlin, as well as several others. His second solo album, "Live from the Boardwalk Bistro," has yet to be released. According to Calderon, he rarely shares his original songs with others because they are so personal. However, inclusive in "Only Trust Your Heart" is "I See You," a touching piece written by Calderon himself for Amy Dalzell, the lucky lady to whom he dedicated the album.

Calderon is pleased with his professional career, which he says, keeps getting better all the time. "Thanks to the support of my family, I've been able to pursue this career and begin to make a decent living."

So how did the University come across this talented Texan? "Actually, I was contacted over the summer by some professors who were interested in jazz," says Late Night Music Series co-coordinator, Kacy O'Brien '03. She followed up by posting the gig on the Central Pennsylvania Friends of Jazz website, to which Calderon responded.

The Late Night Music Series offers an enjoyable alternative to the weekend rituals of fraternity parties and movies.

A sub-section of Activities and Campus Events (ACE), the Series events are planned and provided for University students by O'Brien and her co-coordinator, Daniel Morel '03. The team is open to student feedback, and hopes to increase student interest in the Series this semester.

Following Curtis Calderon, future events include Ember Swift, Dave Hall, and student performances by the BU Jazz Machine and acoustic guitar/vocalist Carolyn Gathman '03. All performances begin at 11 p.m. at the 7th Street Café and are held each Friday evening except during breaks and the final exam period.

The sights and sounds of Sydney Olympic host city entertains with broad culture

By Andrea Beisser

With the Olympic Games just around the corner, it may be helpful to take time to familiarize ourselves with a bit of Aussie culture and music. Sydney, Australia is known as the shining star of the southern hemisphere with its glamorous beaches, attractive museums and art galleries and beautiful national parks and wildlife refuges.

Sydney is also home to the famous Sydney Opera House. This architectural masterpiece is one of Australia's most attractive features. It draws nearly two million people to each of its performances staged in five different venues within the structure. The opera house holds around 3,000 events that carry the unique values of the Aboriginal people as well as perspectives from the neighboring countries of Asia and the Pacific. Blending many different cultures creates a festive, theatrical atmosphere. Musical theatre is an important industry in Australia and Broadway favorites such as "Phantom of the Opera," "Les Misérables" and "Grease" are widely popular among the Aussie people.

Other features of Australia include the flourishing art galleries within the many cities and towns, as well as inspiring literature and film creations. They contribute to the beauty and preservation of Australian culture. Aboriginal arts including paintings, song, dance and storytelling are among the oldest in the world and outline the changes in the people over thousands of years. Some of the most famous novelists include Patrick White, Peter Carey and Tim Winton. Many of you might recall films such as "The Man from Snowy River" and "The Piano," both of which were filmed in Australia.

The "land down under" is an environment filled with artistic magic and inspiration. Even though we may only be able to enjoy it from our television sets as we watch the unfolding of the greatest sporting event in the world, we can imagine the vibrant atmosphere and artistic richness of Australia.

The Push Stars to play at Uptown

By Alex Costos

You might have heard them open for the Red Hot Chili Peppers, "Me, Myself, and Irene." You might have heard them on "Late Night with Craig Kilborn," but, the Push Stars are moving even further up in the world.

The band is a pop-rock group out of Boston, Mass. The three band members released "After the Party" (Capitol Records) on Aug. 29, 2000. With the release of this album and two others, the band has reached new heights.

Out of over 2,000 rock bands in the Boston area, "Debut Album of the Year," "Outstanding Debut CD," "Outstanding Rock Band," and "Outstanding Song/Songwriter" are among the many awards that this band has won in the five years since they began. They have made appearances on the "Jenny Jones Show" and the "Late, Late Night with Craig Kilborn." The Push Stars performed "Bad Sneakers" for the blockbuster hit "Me, Myself, and Irene" and "Everything Shines" for another blockbuster hit "There's Something About Mary."

The band's songs have been played on popular TV shows such as NBC's "ER," ABC's "All My Children," Fox's "Malcolm in the Middle" and MTV's "The Real World." The band achieved even more success in opening for The Red Hot Chili Peppers, Everclear, Sugar Ray and Third Eye Blind along with many, many others.

With Chris Trapper as the main song writer and playing the guitar and vocals, Ryan MacMillan on the drums and percussion and Dan McLoughlin on the bass and keyboard, the band will be granted anything but failure.

"I'm kind of desperate to get thoughts out in a complete way," Trapper said. "Songs do that for me, so I know how much they can mean. It's important to me to be inclusive, rather than perceived as intellectual or clever or so creative that people don't get it. I really want to reach people and do it in a way that makes them feel part of what I'm trying to say. Because, like I said, I know how much songs can mean."

The New York Times called the Push Stars' music "classic pop perfection." And the College Music Journal remarked, "The Push Stars trio perform acoustically rich, smartly arranged... songs which are soul-bearing tales presented with an ever-present sense of compassion, innocence and warmth. It's a rare and splendid thing when a band can mix such simple ingredients and themes and make them so absorbing and sublime. This is a must-hear."

And this band is coming to perform at the University. The overwhelmingly talented Push Stars will be strutting their stuff at 10 p.m. on Sept. 16 at our own night-club, Uptown.

Guest directors conduct workshops

by Kacey O' Brian

Travis De Castro, head of the bachelor of fine arts degree in stage management at Pennsylvania State University, and Michael Kamtman, class of '77 and member of Cap & Dagger, will be on campus this weekend for residencies with the Department of Theater & Dance. Both will be conducting workshops in their respective fields.

De Castro's career has encompassed Broadway, National Tour, Special Events Management and Opera Theaters. He has worked with notables such as Jerome Robbins, Ken Billington, Richard Nelson and Jane Greenwood. De Castro currently produces the Radio City Christmas Spectacular in Myrtle Beach, S.C., for Radio City Productions. He is also director-at-large of the United States Institute for Theater Technology. De Castro is holding his workshop from 1 p.m. to 3 p.m. this Friday in the Theater & Dance Design Studio, room #231. The workshop is open to all.

Kamtman returns to Bucknell to conduct a workshop in Stage Combat, which will take place from 10 a.m. to 12 p.m. this Saturday. The workshop is open to all and will be held in the Tustin Acting Studio. Kamtman will be on campus Sept. 15 - 17 and again Oct. 13 - 15; he will be serving as fight choreographer and vocal coach for "As You Like It," the fall mainstage theater production.

Kamtman has extensive experience in acting, directing and stage combat, having performed in various theaters along the East Coast, specifically concentrating in Shakespearean works. Kamtman is also a member of Cap & Dagger, the first student theater group at Bucknell, which is celebrating its 100th anniversary this year. He has also been involved in film and education.

Kamtman has served as the Fight Captain for the North Carolina Shakespeare Festival for many years and received his M.F.A. at UNC-Greensboro. He created and directed Wings - an educational outreach program designed to introduce Shakespeare and theater to elementary school children. Kamtman studied stage combat in New York City with Certified Fight Masters J. Allen Suddeth, Richard Rafter and Steve Vaughan. He received certification from the Society of American Fight Directors. Kamtman was also elected to membership in Fights R Us, a New York-based organization of highly trained stage combat artists.

Health tips: Ways to help relieve exam stress

By Cheryl Myers

With the first exams of the semester quickly approaching, the majority of University students are trying to figure out exactly how to prepare for the pressures of test taking. Most students experience similar feelings before taking a test: nervousness, a racing heart rate, sweaty palms and difficulty concentrating.

This test-taking anxiety can be a legitimate obstacle for students as they attempt to demonstrate that they know the material on which they are being tested. According to the Journal of the American Medical Association, anxiety is the body's natural response to stressful situations, but this does not mean that it is impossible to manage.

Stress and anxiety can be dealt with in several ways. These methods can include outside intervention, such as talking with a counselor, taking medications, or strategies that involve self-care. The following self-care tips are convenient and applicable ways of easing stress for college students:

—Plan positive solutions to problems. It is often one's own interpretation of stressors that leads to a negative reaction.

—Practice effective time management. This involves setting up a schedule, planning ahead, getting organized and not procrastinating.

—Get enough sleep. Everyone knows that it is important to get eight hours of sleep each night, but not many of us actually do it. Proper sleep helps to cope with problems and eases irritability.

—Exercise at least three times a week. Physical activity not only helps us keep fit, but also reduces levels of stress hormones.

—Establish a network of friends and family that you can talk with about any worries. A study from Education showed that anxious students improved their test performance when they received support from family and friends. These relationships can be beneficial because they convey caring and accepting attitudes, which increase students' self-confidence. Additionally, these interactions prevented students from internalizing their worries.

—Eat a balanced diet, and avoid caffeine, tobacco and alcohol. Balance is essential, and these extra substances can disturb the body's natural sleeping pattern.

—Finally, practice relaxation techniques. These may include yoga, deep breathing, meditation or muscle relaxation. Practicing any of these provides an escape from the outside world for a short period of time. This can help to revive energy levels and the ability to cope with stress.

Vaccine innovations may ease upheaval in developing nations

By Katherine Nowak

At the Loma Linda University School of Medicine, William H.R. Langridge is leading efforts aimed toward the development of edible vaccines for infectious and autoimmune diseases, reports the Sept. 5 issue of Scientific American.

The project, launched in the early 1990's by the Children's Vaccine Initiative (CVI), summoned novel approaches to vaccination in hopes to reduce global mortality of children from communicable diseases. Langridge has been making progress in this area by using foods as deliverers of antigens, substances capable of inducing specific immune responses.

The advantages to palatable vaccines over those administered by injection include reduced risk of infection from contaminated needles, decreased costs and easier delivery to children in third world countries where vaccines often fail because they lose their effectiveness by the time they reach their destination as a result of long transits and warm holding temperatures. The utilization of fruits and vegetables (such as bananas, potatoes, avocados, tomatoes, rice, soybeans, and corn) as harbores of antigens would allow developing countries to "grow" crops for vaccines. Fruits are especially advantageous since they are readily consumed by small children and can be eaten raw.

Oral vaccines are also deemed more appropriate than injected vaccines for immunization against pathogens that infect humans through digestive, respiratory and urogenital canals. "Edible vaccines may be a good way to vaccinate against stomach and intestinal diseases such as cholera, rotaviruses—a major problem with children in developing nations—and the like," said Biology Department's Dr. Marie Pizzorno, specialist in virology. In developing nations, 10.6 million children die from communicable diseases—half of which are diarrhoeal diseases—according to a 1997 United Nations Global Environmental Report. Test trials of these oral vaccines on humans were granted FDA approval in October 1997 and took place at the um, Escherichia coli (E.coli), or pieces of ordinary potatoes. Dosage size was varied, each individual eating 50 or 100 grams of peeled potato once a week. Subjects' blood and stool samples were routinely collected to evaluate the vaccine's efficacy.

More research must be done on vaccine-containing fruits and vegetables before they are distributed in developing countries, however. Dosage requirements remain unknown, as does the degree of plant cell interference with the presence of antigens. How these vaccines will be regulated and which component—the antigen, the genetically-engineered fruit or the transgenic seeds—will be licensed remains in question. However, the benefits could be far-reaching, for the vaccines have already been shown to be effective.

"The concern that some scientists and public policy officials have involves the scenario where the instilled gene that is foreign to a plant gets out into the environment," commented Pizzorno. "If that gene were to be inserted into another organism, be it an insect, bacterium, virus, plant, or animal, it might confer a new property onto that organism. The overall result of this event would not be predictable and may lead to the creation of new infectious diseases or have some detrimental effect on the environment. We cannot predict where the gene might go and what it might lead to."

Inside of the scientific realm exists the challenge of convincing pharmaceutical manufacturers to support research for products aimed at countries beyond the lucrative West, reports Scientific American. The efforts remain underfunded even though philanthropists and international aid organizations vigorously advocate development of the vaccines.

Ninety-one percent of volunteers who received the edible vaccine showed increased amounts of serum antibodies, and 55 percent exhibited rises in intestinal antibodies, both defenses against E.coli. No adverse side effects were experienced by the sub-

Napster battle wages on

By Brian Watson

From its creation over 20 years ago, Microsoft had the manpower and vision to revolutionize the computer industry. Almost 20 years later, a Northeastern University student created a file-sharing application that redefined the fledgling digital music market.

But Shawn Fanning is no Bill Gates. His creation, called Nap-ster, has set a new precedent of success for online media. Following Microsoft's lengthy court battle with the Department of Justice (DOJ), Napster may be setting a new precedent as the next casualty in the quest to establish laws to govern the Internet.

The DOJ battled with Microsoft for over two years. After lengthy trial and subsequent decision this year to split up the company, practically nothing has been resolved. The Recording Industry of America (RIAA), along with several record companies, have filed copyright infringement charges against Napster, claiming the quickly-growing service is stealing money and rights from their rightful owners. Several performers, including Metallica's Lars Ulrich and rapper Dr. Dre, have spoken out against Napster. Ulrich, who testified before a Congressional board this summer, must have been shocked to see Fanning wearing a Metallica T-shirt at last week's MTV Music Awards.

In Napster's defense, artists like Limp Bizkit and Chuck D. have stepped up their support, claiming that the application helps spread different music to those who would not normally hear it.

The RIAA stands firm that Napster's mere existence jeopardizes potential revenue. It claims that by downloading music over the Web, users can obtain songs and quickly burn them onto CDs, thus reducing the need to buy its product.

But many record labels have confirmed that record sales have not been hurt by Napster—in fact, CD sales have gone up since its creation. Napster executives believe their company deserves much of the credit for the increased sales; they see their service as a vehicle for spreading music that will eventually lead to users purchasing more CDs. Record companies have confirmed that the cost to manufacture one compact disc falls below a dollar, yet they don't feel the need to justify selling them for over $15 apiece.

Furthermore, artists don't make much off CD sales; the bulk of their profits come in initial contract signings and touring revenues. The earnings that performers like Metallica and Dr. Dre complain Napster is robbing from them measure in mere cents.

But the ongoing legal battle and criticism against Napster hasn't slowed its progress—Media Metrix, an Internet measurement firm, reported Monday that Napster's traffic more than quadrupled in the past five months, making it the fastest-growing software application ever recorded.

Another measurement service, NetValue, reported a 480 percent traffic increase in July. NetValue's president, Kofi Blankson, told Inter@ctive Week: "The Internet has driven a consumer demand for a forum for enjoying music that has not been able to be met by the music industry. Napster is the forerunner of this technology."

Unfortunately, there was enough public interest to spawn abhorrent media interpretations, such as the 1995 movie, The Net. Other misconceptions, too numerous to count, were becoming the bane of the personal computer.

Companies like Microsoft and Apple did their best to make the computer a friendlier, less threatening entity. However, we now have Register.com using old fears and prejudices as a marketing technique.

Register.com's practices are both immoral and damaging to their own market. Scaring consumers is no way to promote Internet growth. It begs the question, How many people throw away $70 because a commercial intentionally blurred the facts?

One thing is for sure—the $70 registration fee did not assure them an identity on the Information Superhighway. Instead, the sad technical reality is

New Internet advertisements prey on consumer ignorance

Fear, uncertainty and doubt become newest marketing tool

By Rick Hoskinson

The other night I was watching TV, ignoring the commercials to the best of my ability. Usually, I change the channel when TV advertisements begin their inane chatter, but something caught my eye this time.

Register.com was doing a mock-interview advertisement hawking their product. This was just odd enough that I decided to keep watching. I did not like what I saw.

The interviewer and interviewee began by attempting to give a layperson's definition of an Internet domain name. This was a stupefying parade of errors. They then began to spout off reasons for having a domain name, making broad generalizations about its future use.

According to Register.com, a domain name will someday be a person's phone number, home address, and Internet identity—all in one. They also stated that anyone could register your name. Immediately, the interviewee became nervous and asked the obvious question, "Can someone steal my identity?"

The first wave of computer and Internet paranoia manifested itself in fanciful tales of people losing their identity in the sea of cyberspace. Of course, this was just general ignorance about the nature of global networks.

Unfortunately, there was enough public interest to spawn abhorrent media interpretations, such as the 1995 movie, The Net. Other misconceptions, too numerous to count, were becoming the bane of the personal computer.

Companies like Microsoft and Apple did their best to make the computer a friendlier, less threatening entity. However, we now have Register.com using old fears and prejudices as a marketing technique.

Register.com's practices are both immoral and damaging to their own market. Scaring consumers is no way to promote Internet growth. It begs the question, How many people throw away $70 because a commercial intentionally blurred the facts?

One thing is for sure—the $70 registration fee did not assure them an identity on the Information Superhighway. Instead, the sad technical reality is that they paid $70 to resolve a domain name to an IP address for two years.

When an individual registers a domain name, they have done nothing more than give a name to an Internet address. They own the rights to that name, but somehow I don't think RickHoskinson.com will sell for a whole lot after two years.

Anyone registering a domain name purely on the basis of that commercial has just handed over $70 to a company that has enough money as it is.

The scare tactics don't end with Register.com. Other companies are getting into fear tactics. I recently saw a commercial that threatened the loss of my job, unless I called a certain wireless network provider. I'm not really sure how a wireless network can improve my business, and most people don't even know what a wireless network is.

One commercial presents a pair of website developers who prattle on endlessly about technical aspects of a website. A bored, confused executive fails to comprehend anything they are saying. This does not happen in real life.

Internet solutions providers are everywhere, and must behave like real companies to survive in a steadily more competitive market. This commercial could frighten off a businessman looking for an Internet solution. Here is another violation of consumer trust and another example of the computer industry harming itself.

This trend of e-business advertising is extremely disturbing. Companies seem intent on destroying the trust of consumers they have spent years trying to earn.

Perhaps many Internet companies are simply in their death throes. They lash out with whatever weapons are available as they are slowly consumed by a bloated e-commerce marketplace.

To consumers, I suggest this advice: Enjoy the nasty commercials but don't give them any real consideration. There are better sources of information than dying companies trying desperately to sell you something you don't need.

Back-to-back games revive Bison

One day after falling to Columbia, Bison display their potential against Monmouth

Coach Heather Lewis may start making her field hockey team run suicide sprints before games, since the Bison followed their demanding 3-1 loss to Columbia last Saturday with an energized, high-intensity 2-1 victory over Monmouth on Sunday.

"When you play back to back games, you typically perform better the first day," Lewis said, "but we actually played better the second day in a more pressured situation against a good team than we did with fresh legs on Saturday."

Columbia traveled to Lewisburg last Saturday, and it didn't take long for the Lions' offense to make its presence felt—pressuring the Bison defense with 11 first-half shots while netting the game's first three goals.

"Columbia had a player on it that was so good that we had to strategically defend her," Lewis said. "They took us out of what we wanted to do."

Columbia's defense did its job as well, allowing Bucknell just one first-half shot—which turned out to be a goal by senior tri-captain Maura Higgs.

Higgs' tally chopped Columbia's lead to 3-1 with 5:39 remaining in the first half, but that would be the last of the day's scoring as both defenses and goalkeepers tightened the reigns. Bison keeper Sonja Wettergreen '03 registered six saves in the game.

Bucknell's home stand continued against Monmouth the following afternoon, but this time the Bison didn't let their opponent set the pace. Dena Ebert '02 blasted a shot past Monmouth's keeper to give Bucknell a 1-0 lead midway through the first half. Higgs followed with an unassisted goal that would prove to be the game-winner, as Monmouth found the net late in the second half, ending the game as a 2-1 Bucknell triumph.

The Bison attack was relentless, firing 13 shots and six penalty corners while Wettergreen made four saves in goal.

"We showed a lot of improvement from Saturday's game in terms of intensity and consistency," midfielder Melissa Maher '02 said. "The offense kept the ball on their side of the field and we pressured them by getting a lot of corners."

Said defender Erin Plasteras '02, "As a team with so much experience this season, things just hadn't come together as of yet but they really looked like they came together against Monmouth."

The Bison are beginning to gel at precisely the right time, with their first Patriot League game at high-powered Holy Cross scheduled for this Saturday.

Athlete of the week

Greg Costello '03

By David Tomaino

Three-time NCAA champion Steve Prefontaine once said, "I don't just go out there and run. I like to give people something exciting to watch."

Greg Costello '01 did just that last Saturday when he ran a strategic, exciting and well-executed race en route to a hard fought victory in the opening race of the season.

The Pittsburgh native, with a time of 25:23.01, edged out fellow teammate Kevin Weatherill '01 to win his first collegiate cross-country meet. That duo opened up a parade of Bison runners to follow, which catapulted the men's cross-country team to a sweep of Manhattan, Rutgers and Syracuse.

With this victory under his belt, Costello has suddenly shown up on all the radar maps.

"Greg is quite a bit more confident in his abilities this year," head coach Art Gulden said. "His breakthrough was last spring when he took second in the outdoor Track and Field 5,000 meter race."

That confidence, also stemming from a diet of running 10 miles a day this summer, has him leading the pack this September. Costello's setting a personal best time this past weekend has coach Gulden feeling optimistic about this season.

"I expect him to contend for the Patriot League championships this year," he said.

As a runner, Costello keeps things simple. "I just do what my coaches tell me," he said. That approach has augmented Costello's performance thus far, and should lead to his continued improvement.

This Saturday the Bison runners will take their No. 1 ranking in the Patriot League to the Penn State Invitational. For directions call Greg Costello—he's leading the pack.

In a dominating performance last Saturday, the Bison men's and women's cross-country teams swept their competition at home last Saturday with victories in their first meet of the 2000 season.

After defeating Rutgers, Manhattan and Syracuse, the men are 3-0. The women are 2-0, also with wins over Manhattan and Syracuse.

Bison sophomore Greg Costello was the individual champion on the men's side, with a time of 25:23.01. He led a Bucknell pack that included five of the top-10 runners overall and 10 of the top-20 in the race.

Senior Kevin Weatherill '01 finished second, close behind Costello with a time of 25:23.42. Weatherill was followed by Evan Honeyfield and Brian Johnston, who were fourth and fifth respectively.

Women's captain Becki Marshall '02 crossed the line first in the women's race with a time of 18:21.90. She was named the ECAC's cross-country Runner of the Week based on her superior efforts.

The Bison women ended up placing six runners among the top-10, and 11 in the top-20 overall. Junior Theresa Dennis finished third with a time of 18:36.65, followed by teammate Andrea Beisser '03 in fourth, who clocked in at 18:36.91. Kelly McConnell '03, Christina Crowe '03, and Mandy Youmell '01 finished sixth, seventh and tenth, respectively.

"While other teams separated themselves over a distance, we tried to stay together and ran with confidence," said women's team captain Becki Marshall.

Clearly, any coach can be proud of results like these, and head coach Art Gulden is no exception.

"This race was a very encouraging start," he said. "We may have run faster last year, but times don't mean that much to us right now. We typically don't try to be really ready until November."

The team captains on both sides share Gulden's enthusiasm with the results.

"The upper classmen have improved with summer training, and the new freshmen put forth a good effort for their first meet. Overall,

"While other teams separated themselves over a distance, we tried to stay together and ran with confidence."
—Becki Marshall '02, women's cross-country captain it was a pretty solid performance," said men's captain Brad Wertz '01.

The Bison run again next week at Penn State, ranked in the top 25 in the nation. According to Coach Gulden, this meet will serve as "a test" to the team's future potential.

Bison squeak out two OT wins

By Chuck Vicente

Oh how sweet the feeling of victory is—especially after two grueling overtime games.

This past week the women's soccer team gritted out two tough games against St. Joseph's and Duquesne and came out victorious. Their wins did not come easy but demonstrated the perseverance that this young team possesses.

On Sept. 5, the Bison traveled to Philadelphia to battle with St. Joseph's. After 90 minutes of play, the scoreboard remained unlit, forcing the game into overtime.

After a 15-minute overtime period, both teams were still scoreless, forcing yet another overtime. With less than a minute left in the second overtime Kristie Simon '04 had a powerful shot on goal but was denied by the Hawk's goal keeper. However, tri-captain Ali Chandler '02 had a spectacular one-time rebound into the back of the net, giving Bucknell the 1-0 win after 105:54 minutes of play.

Bucknell controlled the offense of the game with 18 shots to St. Joe's six. On defense, Bison goal keeper Laurie Purse '03 saved two shots.

In only their fourth game of their season, this was the Orange and Blue's second overtime contest.

"It is early in the season and we need to find ways to put teams under pressure in the first half," coach Chrissy Findlay explained.

While Findlay would like to see goals scored earlier, the double-overtime victory did show the Bison's "refuse-to-lose" attitude.

Chandler, who scored the winning goal against St. Joe's, said: "I think we are all tired of going into overtime, but it is great to pull together after playing 90 minutes and win in sudden death."

On Sept. 9, Bucknell hosted Duquesne. The Ducks were the first to score on an unassisted shot at the 42:40 minute mark. Bucknell did not wait long to retaliate.

Off of a pass from Kate Cramer '03, Tara Utchel '03 headed the ball and scored, tying the game, 1-1.

Neither team was able to score again in regulation time, sending them into OT. With only a couple of minutes left in the overtime period, Lindsay Slomer '02 capitalized on a deflected cross from Simon and put away the game winning goal for the Bison.

With the 2-1 overtime win over Duquesne, the team increased their record to 3-2 with three consecutive wins.

The team has been getting an extra boost from freshman Simon, who had two key assists this week.

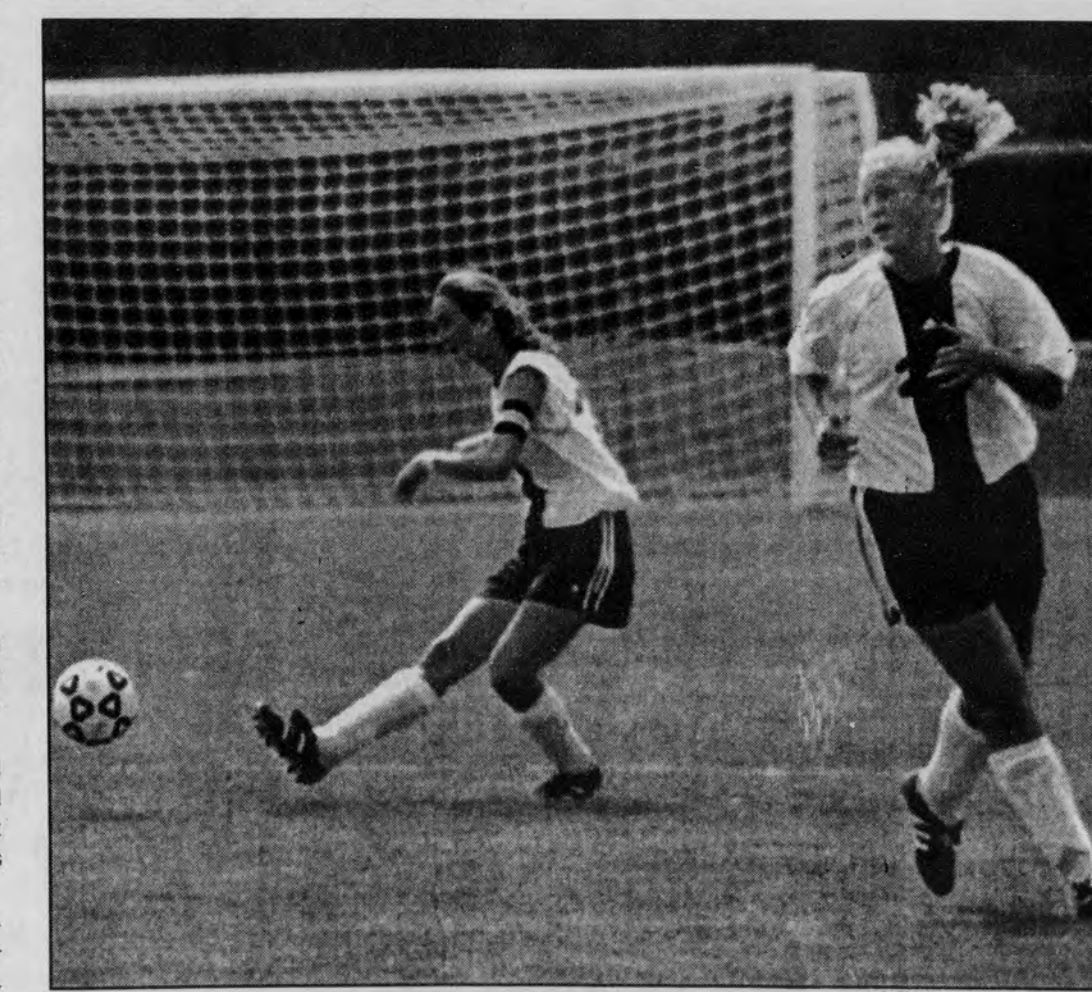

"There is a lot of pressure being the newcomer," she explains, "but my team is great." She credits her stats to the effort her team has given as a whole.

The Bison are on the loose again Friday as they head into their first league match against Navy. Consistent pressure is the key to winning their games; they have had solid defense thus far, yet offensive pressure has been streaky at best.

Nonetheless they are playing as a team—a team which knows they can win. As Coach Findlay explained, "The team is obviously feeling good going into Navy and Lehigh this weekend."

Hopefully this optimism will lead to another victory for the Bison—regulation or overtime.

Alissa Chandler '02 passes upfield to a teammate in Bucknell's 2-1 victory over Duquesne. The Bison will challenge league foes Lehigh and Navy this weekend.

Good-Knight!

It finally happened, and I wasn't even around to see it. But there it was, taped footage from the day before—taped footage of one of the finest and most decent acts in the last hundred years.

Indiana University President Myles Brand, sitting in front of a red IU drop-cloth, officially relieved Bob Knight of his coaching responsibilities at the university.

Talk about overdue. With Bob Knight's formal release Sunday afternoon, Brand did what should have been done decades ago.

Knight was the single biggest embarrassment and mistake in the IU's history. The only shame in this story is that it took the school so many years to get rid of him.

Knight has a rap sheet longer than most criminals. This a guy who fires blank shots at reporters instead of just asking them to leave. This is a guy who physically intimidated a 64-year-old secretary, attacked his own former assistant coach Ron Felling, and punched the university's sports information director over a press release he didn't like.

In 1979, Knight was actually convicted of striking a Puerto Rican police officer before a practice session at the Pan American Games, at which time he was the Team USA coach. He didn't serve any of his six-month sentence, only because the Puerto Rican government decided to drop expedition efforts. And the list goes on.

So why didn't the university send Knight packing long ago? Simpler: they were good. It's amazing how winning can take the focus off other problems. Yes, Bob Knight was masquerading around and making a fool of himself, but the Hoosiers were also winning national championships.

Knight has a career .667 winning percentage and four National Coach of the Year awards on his resume. He is just 117 wins shy of passing Dean Smith to become the NCAA's all-time winningest basketball coach.

But nobody is doubting Knight's ability to motivate his players, to make them better, to prepare them for the next step. He's a devoted, loyal man whose one and only goal is to win, year in and year out. You'd be hard pressed to find someone in the business who's better.

But what has come into question is the coach's ability to control himself, especially now that Indiana is not enjoying success as much as they were a decade ago. Four times in the last six years Indiana has failed to advance past the first round in March. Recently, the pressure on the university to discipline its most visible and disrespectful ambassador has been stepped up.

So when IU Player Neil Reed went public with his statement that Bob Knight physically choked him last September, the University was finally forced into addressing an issue it had ignored for too long. President Myles Brand subsequently issued a "zero-tolerance" policy on May 15, a small but noted redress to the Reed incident and years of other controversial episodes involving the coach.

And then Sunday, he was gone. It was one final act that truly sent Knight packing—the straw that broke the camel's back. Last week, in response to a student who saw him and addressed him only as "Knight," the coach grabbed the student by his arm and began screaming at him—a clear violation of the zero-tolerance policy, and clear grounds for removal.

Even if the student disrespected Knight by calling him only by his last name, Knight has to know better than to touch him. Indiana University officials say they gave the coach one more chance with this policy, and they did. They plainly, however, were waiting for an incident like this one to occur, as well they should have. Bob Knight was given every opportunity to defend himself, to tell his side of the story and to make up for mistakes.

His temper is the obvious problem, but the bigger issue is that he saw things differently than other people. Yes, he knew he punched this person, but, "what's the big deal?" And sure, he put his hands around this kid's throat, but, "he just needed motivation to practice harder."

Don Shula is the winningest coach in NFL history, but you never saw him waving a piece of his own soiled toilet paper and screaming at Dan Marino.

At the press conference, Brand told reporters Knight was "hostile and defiant," and added that "he did not fulfill the promises he gave me" under the zero-tolerance policy.

Brand needs not to defend his decision, because Knight dug his own grave a long time ago. It just got to the point where Brand and other administrators members felt the Hall of Fame coach was more trouble than he was worth.

The players, though, are another story. Sure, they recognize Knight's flaws, but they also realize they came to Indiana to play basketball for him, fanned by him. Several players have already spoken publicly about transfers, although that is bound to subside with the hiring of assistant Mike Davis as interim head coach.

Knight was always larger than life, an untouchable figure etched notoriously into the annals of NCAA basketball lore. He will undoubtedly be given another chance to coach at the collegiate level, because his ability to manage games and develop players still has a large upside.

But hopefully on Sunday Knight realized that sometimes you have to give a little in order to get a little, and that that the word's finally out on him. Indiana can clearly win without Bob Knight—by firing him they already have.

The only question now is how to breathe some dignity and respect back into a basketball program that for too long has traded its decency for success.

So bravo to Myles Brand, and bravo to those who supported him despite the tremendous backlash he was sure to receive.

Because for Indiana University, Sunday night was the first Good Knight in a long, long time.

Men's soccer gets in "W" column

By Katie Yingling

Sometimes it seems that one step forward only results only in two steps back.

The men's soccer team would surely be in agreement after the past week.

The Bison claimed their first victory against Mount St. Mary's last Wednesday at home, only to face two disappointing losses to the University of Vermont and the University of New Hampshire at the 10th Annual Smith Barney Soccer Classic last weekend.

According to head coach Brendan Nash, the team knew going into the game against Mount St. Mary's that they "had to play with pride and heart."

After two previous losses, they did play with pride and heart the whole way to the end, scoring the only goal of the game in the 101st minute of play, earning the Bison an overtime victory. The lone goal was scored by senior Geza Lendvai-Lintner off of an assist from fellow classmate Angelo Pace and Sam Graziano.

The game was fairly evenly matched, with Bucknell leading 17-14 in shots and Mount St. Mary's 9-5 in corners. Goalsies for both teams tallied six saves and freshman goalkeeper Keith Sheldon claimed his first collegiate shutout. The boost of confidence Nash hoped the team would gain from this victory, however, was somewhat short-lived.

In a game against the University of Vermont on Saturday, the Bison were simply not able to capitalize on their opportunities. Although Vermont took only three more shots on goal than Bucknell, they did set themselves apart by scoring four more goals.

Vermont got themselves on the board in the ninth minute, and despite the uphill battle the Bison were facing, they did continue to fight. It was the same attitude that kept the Bison afloat in their match against UNH on Sunday, with their one and only goal coming in with only eleven minutes left to play.

Against UNH the play was once again fairly even, with each team claiming an equal sixteen shots. Bucknell's appearance on the score board was the result of sophomore Nick Taylor's goal off of an assist from freshman Chris Beekman. Bucknell carried the play in the last eleven minutes but were unable to place another ball in the net, losing the game, 2-1.

"The team is still young, and we are still getting used to playing together," Graziano said of the weekend losses. "Luckily our Patriot League competition doesn't start for a week and we are looking to have things together by then."

The Bison, who are currently 1-4, will Bison can't get on track at Youngstown

By Pat Evans

"That which does not kill you shall only make you stronger."

After watching her team drop three difficult matches this past weekend, volleyball head coach Cindy Opalski remains genuinely optimistic and feels that the team is very close to where it wants to be.

Bucknell participated in the Youngstown State Tournament where they faced formidable opponents Youngstown State, UNC—Asheville and Drexel. "It was very tough competition," Opalski said, "and a good pretest for eventual league play."

The Bison first played a hard fought match with the home team, Youngstown State. Each set was close, but Bucknell lost 3-0 (15-10, 15-11, 15-15).

"A couple of things here and there that could have put us over the top just didn't occur," Opalski said.

The next match with UNC—Asheville was even closer, but once again the breaks just didn't go Bucknell's way.

nel's way, as the Bison fell 3-1 (15-12, 15-10, 10-15, 15-11).

Shannon Walker '02, who earned a spot on the All-Tournament Team, led the Bison attack with 21 kills in the match. "I'm very excited that I received the honor," Walker said, "but I owe all of my success to the rest of my team, and especially to my setters."

Finally, the Orange and Blue challenged Drexel and was defeated 3-0 (15-8, 15-9, 15-10). The Bison fought hard but were simply out-executed.

Setter Whitney Williams led the team throughout the tournament, recording 91 assists. "I tried to be a leader, and keep everything aggressive," said Williams.

The Bison will host their own tournament this weekend. On Friday, they will face Manhattan and an undefeated Virginia Commonwealth squad. Saturday's matches against St. Francis (PA) and Stony Brook should also be good preparation for upcoming Patriot League play.

"Right now I compare our team to hot water," Opalski said. "We're just one or two degrees away from boiling. If we can keep up the emotion and passion, we'll be tasting a lot of victories soon."

Once again, the problem here seemed to be scoring, as Iona entered the second half leading 3-1. A rally in the third period brought the Bison back into the game with a goal each from Greditzer and McCarty, both scoring out of the hole.

Despite Bucknell's intimidating press and crash defense, Iona capitalized on Bison turnovers in the fourth period and scored two counterattack goals early in the quarter, leaving them to finish the contest with a two-point victory. Senior James Mante and McCarty both had two goals, with Permisohn adding four steals.

"We wanted to beat Iona after losing to them last weekend," Permisohn said, "and we are playing well together as a team. We just need to start scoring, and I know that once we can start doing that, the wins will come our way."

In their third game of the weekend, the Orange and Blue took on No. 16 ranked Princeton, who had

Bison even overall record at 4-4; will host Bucknell Invitational this weekend

By Brooke Rea

The first game against Queens quickly revealed Bucknell's strengths and weaknesses as the Orange and Blue came up short, 13-3. While they played well defensively, the Bison had trouble capitalizing on offensive opportunities to put the ball in the net.

Many high percentage chances were wasted with shots either missing the goal or shot directly at the goalie," Zeigler commented. "The majority of Queens' goals resulted from counterattacks off of missed goals or half court offensive opportunities."

Of the Bison's three goals, senior Tate Greditzer chipped in two and senior co-captain Justin McCarty added one. Co-captain Kevin Permisohn '01 had two assists in the contest.

Bucknell's second match-up against Iona was perhaps the most anticipated game of the weekend, as the Bison hoped to stomp the team who beat them handily at the Navy Invitational last weekend. Losing by a much smaller margin this time, the Bison fell 7-5 in a close defensive

The Bucknell men's water polo team made its second appearance this season at the Princeton Invitational, dropping three games and winning one to level its overall record at 4-4.

Despite the three losses, head coach John Zeigler is happy with the way the men played. "We made many improvements from last weekend's play at the Navy Invitational," he said. "The guys played with an intensity that was lacking our first weekend."

A tournament consisting of some of BU's toughest competitors, the Princeton Invitational gave the Bison a glimpse at what they will be up against this season. First up was 13th-ranked Queens, followed by a rematch with Iona, in which the Bison hoped for redemption after a tough loss last weekend. The third game allowed no time to let up, as the Bison faced no. 16 Princeton and finally rounded out the weekend with a game against conference foe Johns Hopkins.

Foo Fighters to play fall concert

By Peter Van Emburgh

The wait is over—the Foo Fighters are coming to the Fieldhouse on Nov. 11, headlining the fall concert.

According to the Foo Fighters' press release, "Foo Fighters remind us that it is okay to play loudly and in tune, that songs can still be about girls and that not every band needs a DJ in the mix."

Potoczak and Conrad both explained that students in the past have complained that the University gets too many "hippy" hands. They are quick to name Rustie Root, Dave Matthews and Tim Reynolds, Counting Crows and Indigo Girls as close examples of this pattern.

"Students want a harder show," Conrad said. Last fall, a survey was distributed to students in the LC Mail asking students to give their input in the concert selection. "Foo Fighters did very well in the survey," said Jackie Flicker '02, concert committee co-chair. "We're here to bring the best band possible to the campus community."

Tickets go on sale Oct. 12 for BU ID purchases at a cost of $15. Tickets for the general public opens up for sale on Oct. 16 for $25.

Police crack down on students

Due to numerous complaints, Lewisburg Police Department takes increased action

By Rebecca Rowland

The downtown areas of Sixth, Seventh and St. Catherine's Streets have been under fire lately as Lewisburg residents report noise violations in increasing numbers to the Lewisburg Police Department.

A total of 14 complaints have been made regarding student parties since Aug. 26, 8 of which have resulted in citations. The citations entail fines in the hundreds of dollars and potential loss of off-campus living privileges for the student-homeowners.

Last night alone three house parties on St. Catherine's street were closed by the Lewisburg police; the student homeowners all received citations for disorderly conduct as did one other, non-home owning student.

"Once a complaint is filed, officers go to the scene and determine whether there is sufficient cause for a citation," Chief of Police William R. Nietz, Jr. said. "If there is sufficient cause, a citation is issued. The borough has a no-tolerance policy."

However, Borough Council President Yvonne Morgan stresses that the borough has not initiated a plan of action and is not cooperating with the police on any such program.

"The Borough Council is never informed of police plans to more strictly enforce specific laws," Morgan said. "That is strictly police work."

Nietz denies that a new policy has been implemented, cracking down on student parties. Yet, Nietz acknowledges certain existing policies are being applied to the downtown noise situation.

Project SCAT, introduced last year, provides overtime police officers who then focus on one aspect of law enforcement (for instance parole violators or speeding) for a specific amount of time.

"Noise violations have been a target of SCAT in the past," Nietz said. "And judging from the number of complaints we have been receiving, it may very well be a target in the future."

This means that there will probably continue to be a unit of either uniformed or plainclothes police officers whose sole responsibility of the night is to enforce noise codes.

However, the police may not approach a party unless a neighbor has called and complained. While there is no law against loitering, students come to be loiterers and become "disorderly" when the noise exceeds that which is deemed appropriate.

While the majority of complaints stem from noise, several actions can be considered "disorderly" by the police and result in a citation: public urination and "lewd behavior" are also disruptive and inappropriate.

"Most Bucknell students are mature and thoughtful and behave well, whether they live in or visit the St. Catherine St. area," Dean of Students Richard Ferraro said. "But there are some who need to rethink what they are doing, not only for their own benefit but for the benefit of others."

It is the position of Ferraro and the University that, although students who reside downtown are not on University property, it is necessary, for the sake of town/gown relations, to play a part in controlling the situation downtown.

"Bucknell cannot ignore difficulties related to students in its environs," Ferraro said. "And persons who live in the St. Catherine St. area are most definitely in Bucknell's environs."

Public Safety plays a support role with the local police. They do not have the authority to enforce noise violations off campus but are permitted to advise students about potential problems.

"Our only jurisdiction has been and continues to be off campus," Director of Public Safety Vincent DeClerio said. "The police have jurisdiction off-campus."

Carpenter said, "It was cool to see the other works published. Everyone's work is unique and original in style."

Carpenter describes his own poem, "How Not to Come Out to Win [the Smithsonian Prize]," as "written in a less contemporary form and was meant to be more of a slam."

Alum defends innocent inmates

McCloskey '64 has overturned 22 convictions of innocence

By Rebecca Rowland

The Office of the Chaplain will be sponsoring a speech by James C. McCloskey '64 next Thursday, Sept. 28 entitled "Conquering the Innocent in America." McCloskey has successfully overturned the convictions of 22 inmates accused of capital crimes since 1983 through his work with Centurion Ministries.

McCloskey founded Centurion Ministries in 1983. McCloskey, a student at the Princeton Theological Seminary at the time, was assigned Trenton State Prison for his ministry fieldwork. Jorge De Los Santos was an inmate, serving a life sentence for the 1975 murder of a Newark, NJ car salesman.

De Los Santos convinced McCloskey of his innocence and, after McCloskey found a lawyer that would take his case, was freed in 1983 by a federal judge. "Jim's talk is particularly timely because of the recent national attention being paid to wrongful convictions," Rev. Ian Oliver said. "He has worked tirelessly for almost two decades to free the innocent people who are being executed."

McCloskey was awarded the University Alumni Service to Humanity Award in 1989. He has also received the Alumni Athletic Achievement Award in 1999—McCloskey was a varsity basketball player during his time at the University.

The speech will be free of charge and will be held in the Gallery Theater Sept. 28.

Sponsored by the office of the chaplain, McCloskey '64 is scheduled to speak on innocent convicts. He has been awarded the Alumni Service to Humanity Award by the University.

Lambda Chi Alpha hosts 5K run

Paige Cull—The Bucknellian

Lambda Chi Alpha and the Ronald McDonald House of Danville are sponsoring the 13th annual 5K run for the children on Saturday, Sept. 23 at the Matheson Memorial Stadium. The pre-registration fee is $12.00 and registration on the day of the event is $14.00. All proceeds benefit the Ronald McDonald House.

CORRECTION

The article entitled "New faces in Administration" in last week's Bucknellian contained several errors.

Vice President for Finance and Administration Peggy Plympton is not former President William Adams' only remaining appointee; General Counsel Richard Zanzitis and Interim Vice President for Student Affairs and Secretary of the University Charles Pollock were also appointed by Adams.

Current President Steffen Rogers did not appoint either Dean of Students Rick Ferraro or Associate Dean of Engineering Karen Marosi; Ferraro was appointed by Adams, and Marosi's position is not a presidential appointment.

Several other appointees were incorrectly listed as permanent positions. Assistant to the President Mitch Chernin, Vice President for Academic Affairs Gene Gerdes, Dean of Arts and Sciences Mark Padilla, Dean of Engineering Jim Orison and Vice President for Development John Mosser have been hired on interim bases.

Finally, former Vice President for University Relations Richard Johnson was incorrectly listed as University Director of Principle Gifts.

most meaningful and influential things I have done on this campus throughout my almost four years here," Billmyer said. "I will forever have ties to the people I was able to help in Nicaragua. We would love to get as many people as possible involved both physically and monetarily. It's certainly a truly compassionate and worthwhile cause everyone should think about."

After Hurricane Mitch hit Central America in 1998 setting the whole area back fifty years—Jamie Cistoldi '99 mentioned she wanted to do something about the devastation. Through CUM-BRE, Bucknell's Hispanic organization, she gathered clothes and other material aid, plus donations and sent them to Nicaragua.

"In March 1999, twenty-four students and six staff made the trip," Reverend Ian Oliver said. "It was a remarkable experience. In the Nueva Vida camp, the students built simple 'techus' or roofs-a-tin roof on 2x4's for the camp's families. Dr. Stechschulte of the University Student Health Service provided a free clinic in a tin shed with a dirt floor."

The camp area now has simple houses, some water and electricity, but no jobs—there is 90% unemployment and some residents are facing starvation. The Bucknell clinic building that is supposed to be completed this fall is the primary medical facility for all 12,000 people.

Dunn relates an interesting story, "One nurse working at the temporary health clinic, Maria, was pregnant with her 11th child when we were there last January. Because there is not space in her one-room home, she and her other 10 other children have to rotate sleeping hours."

"The Brigade trip to Nicaragua was definitely one of the most eye-opening and amazing experiences of my life," Dunn continued. "It was incredible to see the radiant smiles of the children and to see how people with so little can be so happy with the simplest of things."

The deadline to submit an application is Oct. 13.

Battle of the Borough

Recent events in student-populated areas of Lewisburg have spurred an increase in police activity, resulting in numerous citations against University students.

But let's not forget, "Lewisburg loves Bucknell students." As long as we're quiet. And don't drink.

The majority of University students believe that either the Lewisburg Police or its residents are out to get us. With talks of stakeouts and even more crackdowns on parties, their beliefs are certainly justified.

Complaints have been on the rise in the past few years, sparking a strong feeling of animosity between the two groups. With increased police presence in student-populated areas, students are beginning to feel unwelcome downtown.

Lewisburg Police has acted on 14 noise complaints since late August, issuing eight citations. According to Police Chief William R. Nietz, the SCAT program initiated last year has targeted and will continue to go after noise complaints against students. As an added bonus, the police may be bringing along local codes administrators-the pair will now be working cooperatively to prosecute students.

Each year, it seems to get more and more extreme, though Borough Council members have repeatedly said that University students would not be subjected to any harsher policies, nor would they work in cooperation with the police against students.

Off-campus students should be allowed to live as college students, which most likely includes partying without being subject to unfair expectations. Students, however, must also extend certain courtesies to Borough residents.

There's simply no excuse for students littering downtown areas with cups of beer and waste from parties. Residents have complained of loud noises that wake their children and deter their sleep. Many feel that their lives are being disrupted, and they may be right.

Students must develop a certain level of respect toward their neighbors. They must be more considerate of young children and working families in respect to noise control.

An understanding must be reached; no group should be compromised.

The Bucknellian proposes a meeting to take place between Dean Ferraro, Chief Nietz, Borough Council members and all students living off-campus. All sides should be willing to meet to openly discuss issues without pointing a finger. This may be a drastic idea, but at this point, it may be the only way to solve a drastic problem.

College experience has more to offer than a degree

By Matthew Hinson

Four short years—that's all the time we have—to learn, to grow, to challenge our world and ourselves. Once our undergraduate years are behind us, we are expected to either go to graduate school or go to work. Either way we will become ever more focused on the appropriate "goals" for life society has set out for us—a job, a family, being able to carve out a stable niche in society.

Yet even now we are told to focus upon our current goal—getting an undergraduate degree. Somehow I feel that most of us are too focused on that goal, ignorant of the huge possibilities open to us as undergraduate students. There is so much to learn, and so very little time in which to learn it, but we do not realize this until it is too late and our opportunities are gone.

If you look back on the history of undergraduate students, you witness immense power. This is especially true for the 1960s and 1970s. During this era of change, undergraduate campuses provided much of the fuel for the fire of new thought, discussion, and action. I'm not suggesting that we bring back events like the Kent State riot; what I do say is that we have the power to change the world within our grasp if we so choose to use it.

The best way to change the world is to first change ourselves. The best way to do this is through education. Our education should not merely be the pursuit of the knowledge we need to succeed professionally, but the pursuit of that knowledge which will make us whole. For each person the path is different, but the goal is the same.

Involving oneself in the extracurricular activities offered by the University is one way to expand your horizons. Partying, in a different way, does the same. But the purest form of expansion, and one which surely will stay with us forever, is within the educational sphere of college.

By studying subjects not directly related to our majors, we will have a broader spectrum from which to draw insight, and be better able to come up with original solutions to the problems we will face.

So "carpe diem!" This is our one opportunity to absorb the knowledge of the world without any other pressures. No matter what we choose to do during these four years, we will be the stronger for it. By taking advantage of the immense resources at our disposal, we will become stronger, better people, better able to handle whatever may face us in the future.

Study abroad: survival of the fittest

By Maureen Fick

From the moment you set foot on campus as a freshman, the question flies at you: "Are you going to go abroad?"

This increasingly popular (and more widely available now than ever) opportunity may not be on your mind as you begin what seems like it will be your four lengthy college years. But, as a sophomore, you are expected to decide and, by junior year, you are swamped by the consuming application process. I, like so many of my peers, plan to study abroad during the spring semester and, like them, am in a constant state of panic, creating a mental checklist of the steps that need to be taken before I am even sure I am going.

To study in another country for the second half of this academic year, I must get on a plane in early January. Travel plans must be made, tickets and Eurail passes must be obtained, passports renewed, all earthly possessions accompanying me must be packed and find their way overseas at the same time and I must bid a tearful farewell to so many friends whose faces will be absent for five months. Yet, though so much must be arranged, I do not find out if I am even going until late Oct. or early Nov.

And this sounds like the stressful part! Ha. My application process began last March when the counselor in our Office of International Education suggested I get my application to a more competitive program out right away in case they admitted students on a rolling admission policy. From there, I wrote a couple essays, filled out my necessary personal information and dutifully wrote a $30 check so the people on the other end would read it all. Oh wait. There are also two professor evaluations and a form for the abroad counselors, all of which require meetings to discuss your plans and the forms and then the hassle of photocopying each document in the event that it does not end up at your desired program's office. Yes, this last part is important, as I actually had my main envelope get lost in the mail.

Score one for the U.S. Postal Service. Eventually they found it though and the call that it had arrived could easily be one of the high points of my last week of school.

Now, just when the last section of the application has gone out and your folder is much thinner now that its contents are safely in the hands of those contemplating your academic fate, you think you can breathe a sigh of relief. Hardly. Unless you are studying in France or Barbados, you have to apply to a program at a different college, meaning there is a separate application for Bucknell. The University has to limit the number of students that can go abroad during second semester and an application helps them determine your eligibility. So now add to the previous list, two advisor recommendations if the Office of International Education does not have copies from the first application and another essay. None of these sections are particularly time-consuming or complicated, but it is hard to keep straight whether or not that last recommendation was for Bucknell or the main application, where it has to go and by what date. Deadlines get confused, making it necessary for you to check your wristwatch every few days to reorient yourself.

Now, at this point in the process, most people would be finished. Relief could pour out as water does from an unclogged faucet and celebrations of one's tenacity could begin. But, of course, this was not in my cards. In a moment of sheer, and now I realize life-saving, paranoia, I began to wonder what I would do if I was rejected by the one program to which I had applied. One program, one application, but countless hours of work, inconvenience, hopeful planning and excited conversation about the experiences to come. One program, one program director could change all the images I had of myself speaking fluently, dancing in the streets, meeting new friends and coming home a more well-rounded and "worldly" person. I immediately began researching a back-up program.

That is where I am today. Another essay, this time not in English, another counselor form, more professor evaluations and even seven required passport photos await my outwardly boundless energy and enthusiasm. Trust me, it's a facade. I can't wait for the day that each application is off my hands. And even more so, I can't wait for the day I board the plane to live in a different way than I ever have before. I just hope that after all the trouble, everything works out. It's a good thing The Bucknellian's writers contribute tales of their glory days abroad because, and I'm sure the other students applying as I am right now agree, they keep me optimistic and excited and remind me that it will be worth the effort after all.

He said enough, though. The trap was set. No other major Eastern University offered me a garbage bag full of Pop-Tarts. So here I am at a very pretty but sort of insane school where people seem to enjoy taking business classes and joining clubs and exercising, and I have yet to receive Pop-Tart one.

If there was a Pop-Tart night in 1997, it should be brought back. I do not think this was the case, though. I have purchased several boxes of Pop-Tarts in my time here, but it's not the same thing. My patience is wearing thin.

Wave 'Bye Bye Bye' to your sanity

Contagious "boy band" phenomenon becoming 'larger than life'

By Kristen Jancuk

There are a few things in this world that make me truly, inexplicably happy: ice cream with brownies in it, platform shoes, body glitter and Justin Timberlake. Yes, Justin Timberlake. The one with the curly blond hair. Unfortunately, I am not one of the few lucky people with tickets to see NSYNC in November and I am bitter. Very bitter. This worries me.

What is it about "boy bands" that has made the world certifiably insane? A good friend of mine, who knew that getting NSYNC tickets for my birthday would pretty much make my life, was nearly decapitated the Uni-Mart this past Saturday. These "lives" consisted of all the teenage girls in Lewisburg and their mothers, wielding credit cards and a cell phone.

Cell phone? Yes, people were actually trying to call Ticketmaster while in line for tickets. There's just something wrong with that. Those who weren't calling Ticketmaster were calling their husbands at home, to check on the status of buying tickets online. My sister attempted to buy tickets online to a show in D.C., which sold out in all of eight minutes. That's not even enough time for our computer to sign on to AOL.

Last February, thanks to the persistence of two of my very brave friends who camped out for tickets, I gleefully attended a Backstreet Boys concert at Penn State. All our friends joked about how we would be the oldest people there. We were not. There were grown women there... without children.

I think we saw half of Bucknell's female population there. There were some poor professors "dragged" along who were miraculously able to sing along to every song. And there were about five million 14-year-old girls dressed liked hookers in the hopes that that a Backstreet Boy would risk jail time and take a liking to them. The screaming did not stop for four straight hours.

How many of you have "Making the Band" on "in the background" while you're getting ready to go out at night? That's what I thought. It's boy band insanity at a new level. These boys not only sing and dance, but they're They've been on the cover of every magazine, on every talk show, in every parade and holiday special and if you search the Internet each band has a plethora of fan websites, usually created by teenage girls, pledging their love for J.C. or Brian.

The funniest part is that nobody "likes" these bands. You know their names, all the words to their songs and you've memorized the "Bye Bye Bye" dance, but the minute someone says something about a "boy band" you turn red and hide the CD under the bed, as if you'd rather divulge your secret plans to take over Guam than admit to owning "No Strings Attached."

The boy band phenomenon never ceases to amaze me. The cynic in me can mock it, but in reality I am trapped in the madness. So this is a warning to you. If you don't listen to the boy bands, I beg you, don't start. If you do listen to them, I feel your pain. I'm thinking of starting a support group. And if you have NSYNC tickets, give me a call.

A lost sanctuary

Immigration has Switzerland up in arms

By Gretchen Schrock

Anti-foreigner sentiment is once again sweeping across the European continent, though not from an expected source such as Austria or Germany, but from the reputed haven of the persecuted Switzerland. Next weekend, the Swiss citizenry will vote on whether to restrict the influx of foreigners into its borders to 18 percent of their total population, now at 7.3 million. The reasoning behind this action is that immigrants, who are supposedly stealing away potential employment from native Swiss, are inundating the country.

It cannot be denied that Switzerland does boast the highest number of foreigners per capita on the European continent or that the level of unemployment is so low that Swiss companies must look abroad to fill job vacancies. Furthermore, isolationist sentiments are deeply embedded into the Swiss national identity, especially that of the German-speaking eastern portion of the country. This does not eliminate the fact that seven times since 1964 and now once more, the Swiss population is trying to reduce the number of immigrants, who are possibly religiously or ethnically persecuted or have dire economic conditions in their home countries.

However, the government is staunchly opposed to such an effort. Contending that the quota could undermine the booming Swiss economy and harm Switzerland's ties with the other members of the European Union, officials have moved to counter the referendum by moving to tighten permits for non-European Union citizens and make naturalization easier for non-Swiss. De-creating the country's ability to embrace refugees, quotas would question the humanitarian tradition of the government. "We are obliged by law to take in those genuinely persecuted in their country, but we won't be able to give temporary protection to refugees from places like Bosnia and Kosovo if this succeeds," Paul Huber, head of the federal refugee office, said to the New York Times.

Yet, Swiss residents are not listening to the advice of government experts, but only listen to their own ignorant perceptions. Quoted by the New York Times, Vanessa Wanner, a 22-year-old hairdresser, said, "The salons prefer to hire foreigners because they can pay them much less. I like foreigners here. It's interesting to know their ways, but they take jobs from us." The citizens who think in a similar manner fail to acknowledge that it is not the foreign population that is taking jobs away from them, but the rules of the new global capitalist economy. A business, no matter how ethical or fair it is, will hire the person whom it can pay less, in order to keep its costs down. It is not only the overall costs to a company which influences its hiring practices, but also that the most qualified individuals are not always found in the native population, but in other countries.

In addition, a feeling of superiority over other cultures and language is also evident. Young, educated mothers assert that the increasing flow of immigrants whose native language is not German or French will lower the quality of education. Is it not the universal belief that quality education comes not from the students but from the passionate, caring teachers and administrators? Doesn't every child, no matter its place of origin or native tongue, have a right to a decent education, one that can give him the opportunity to succeed at whatever he desires? Furthermore, could not the experiences, turmoil and culture of that immigrant child enhance the education of a Swiss child? In denying immigrants from entering their borders, the Swiss are denying their children a more educated, open mind.

With anti-immigration sentiment and laws finding their way into every European state, where are the persecuted to flee the horrifying war, staggering unemployment, or abject poverty of its homeland? This year, the election of a right wing, anti-foreigner prime minister in Austria and stricter asylum laws in Great Britain may have eliminated those countries from the list of potential havens. If this Swiss referendum finally succeeds, Switzerland will no longer be that sanctuary of which so many people have dreamed.

Chase and J.P. Morgan merge

By Jim Leahy

The finance industry has been going through a great deal of consolidation in the past 10 years, a tradition that continued last Wednesday when the Chase Manhattan Bank and J.P. Morgan & Company agreed to merge in a deal that will cost Chase over $30 billion in stock.

A combination of the two companies will create the third largest financial institution in the country behind Citigroup and the Bank of America Corporation. Based on current valuations, the combined company, which will be known as J.P. Morgan Chase & Company, will have combined assets of $60 billion, $31 billion in combined revenue and $7.5 billion in earnings.

But the industry is not new to this kind of combination. Two years ago, Citigroup was enlarged when Travelers Group and Citicorp merged.

That corporation alone includes Citibank, Salomon Smith Barney, Travelers and Primerica. Last year, Bankers Trust was acquired by Germany's Deutsche Bank. And this summer has seen two other big deals. Switzerland's UBS is acquiring PaineWebber and Credit Suisse Group plans to buy Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette.

Chase Manhattan Bank and its leader, William Harrison, are not new to such mergers and acquisitions. In his short tenure as the bank's CEO and chairman, Harrison has brokered deals to buy Hambrecht & Quist of San Francisco, the Beacon Group and Britain's Robert Fleming Group.

Chase is also the product of multiples, founded in 1799 by the New York City Council with members Alexander Hamilton and Aaron Burr as the Manhattan Company to supply water to the city of New York. A bank was formed in 1808 and by 1859, the Bank of The Manhattan Company came to New York State's aid when it needed to pay interest on the debt incurred when building the Erie Canal. In 1955, the Manhattan Company joined forces with the Chase National Bank. A few years later, Chase had its most famous chairman and CEO, David Rockefeller, who served in the post from 1969 until 1981.

At the same time, another bank was growing. The New York Chemical Manufacturing Company was founded in 1823 as a producer of drugs, dyes, solutions and paints. One year later the company opened a bank. When 1851 came around, the now Chemical Bank had divested itself of the chemical company and was now a bank. The corporation of the consumer and commercial banking operations will be used as the strong backbone around which the bank exists and flourishes.

J.P. Morgan dates back to the mid-1800s when John Pierpont Morgan established a banking firm that would become a family dynasty. The firm grew until the 1933 Glass-Steagall Act broke up the firm. Twenty-five of the firm's employees left and started the Morgan Stanley investment bank, now known as though its stock rose sharply before the deal was confirmed, Morgan's stock has experienced a similar phenomenon, as prices have dropped substantially. This may not be as clear-cut because of the problems on Wall Street in the last couple of weeks due to earnings fears and crude oil prices, but one must wonder.

In his book about J.P. Morgan's legendary firm he details its history and describes it as the "first in quality by any measure you can think of." Chernow also points out that the firm had a market capitalization greater than any American bank as of 1900. But by the late '90s, Citicorp, following its acquisition of Travelers, was valued at ten times that of Morgan. He ends his column with "that world of 'high finance' has now perished... we shouldn't be surprised that J.P. Morgan & Co. proved the most prominent casualty."

Where J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. goes from here is yet to be seen. Will the deal be favorable for company shareholders? Will the bank be able to grow revenues while keeping to its history of customer service? Whatever happens, this deal keeps both firms at the forefront of the industry and positioned to lead banks and investing well into the new century.

Olympics mean big business

By Michael Boland

$705 million. That is a great deal of money, enough to pay Bucknell's 2000-2001 tuition approximately 29,749 times over. It's also the amount of money that NBC has paid the International Olympic Committee (IOC) for broadcasting rights to this year's Summer Olympics.

This amount sounds like a fortune; however, it's nothing compared to the $900 million that NBC will receive in Olympic advertising revenue over the next two weeks. Financially, NBC and the IOC are doing just fine, but the bloated dollar figures that accompany corporate sponsorships, along with the recent admission of professional athletes into certain competitions, are leading some to question if the Games still retain any of the purity and wonder that helped make them such an event in the first place.

Like villains in an old cartoon, corporate executives look at the Olympic games with dollar signs in their eyes. From a business point of view, they have good reason. Sponsors such as McDonald's, Visa, and UPS know that worldwide, there are billions of people watching the Olympics, and the name exposure the Summer Games provide could translate into millions or even billions of dollars in extra sales revenue. Companies realize that almost any amount of money they invest in Olympic advertising will probably be recouped in increased sales—the audience, their range of prospective consumers, is just so large that a payoff for the sponsor is almost inevitable. Nike officials will admit that they usually experience a sales spike after the Summer Olympics. But at the same time, Olympic organizers such as the United States' Jim Grice continue to insist that:

"The Olympics are not about commercializing or commercial endorsements." Is that right? Grice's title is, after all, Director of Business Development for the United States Olympic Committee. Of course, the IOC knows that its Games provide an ideal billboard for corporations, so it uses its leverage to extract huge fees from any company seeking to associate its name with the Olympics. Generally, only the largest multinationals can afford these licenses. Not only that, but the IOC has used the system of "sole sponsorships" quite effectively. The list of "exclusive providers to the 2000 Games" is as exhaustive as it is absurd: right now in Sydney there is an "official Olympic provider" of "wireless technology equipment" (Samsung), not to be confused with the official Olympic provider of "audio visual equipment" (Panasonic) or "information technology" (IBM). And don't forget John Hancock, the official "life insurance/annuities" provider to the Olympic Games, or Visa, the "consumer payment system" for the true Olympic fan. It's gotten to the point where some Sydney security guards will not allow spectators to carry Pepsi into athletic events because; "it would upset the Coke people."

Ancient Greece would roll over in its proverbial grave. There's also the nagging issue of drug abuse by Olympic athletes. A recent Reuters article described it as follows: "Drug Free Olympics Places Second to Profits." Suspicion grows that the IOC knows about doping among its competitors, but trades purity and integrity for star-power, world-records, flashy performances and the resulting sponsorship dollars that flow from increased audiences. There's a popular saying among top athletes today: that in order to make it as an Olympic star, you need four things: a great coach, a great lawyer, a great agent and a great chemist. Cynicism abounds—no one is sure exactly how much the IOC does to discourage drug use by its athletes, but what has been uncovered so far has not been promising.

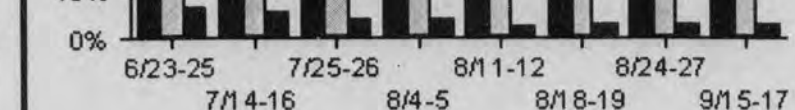

In all fairness, corporations exist to make money, so perhaps they cannot be faulted for the current situation. If they wish to invest hundreds of millions into sponsorships which they believe will help their company, then who's to stop them? The Olympics are a spectacular business opportunity for anyone who can get a foot in the door. But if that is what the Olympics must be about, critics argue, then it might be time for them to drop some of the grandeur and self-importance, and just come clean about what they really are.

After Clinton vetoed the tort reform bill, Umprey's law firm contributed $40,000 to the Democratic National Committee. This gives the appearance that Clinton's veto was used to raise campaign cash and that Gore was somehow involved. The matter was brought to the attention of the Department of Justice's (DOJ) campaign finance task force, which dismissed the matter after finding no grounds for an investigation.

This, much like the other Gore indiscretions, is not a matter of actually breaking the law (the DOJ ruled that there were no grounds for investigation or prosecution for the Buddhist Temple visit either); it is a matter of the appearance of wrongdoing. This appearance cannot be denied or defended.

But the vice president is not alone. There has never been a proven link between campaign donations and votes or governmental action. The appearance or possibility of that quid pro quo, though, saturates the political world. George W. Bush raked in contributions from Texas' biggest polluters and then proceeded to allow them to self-regulate. Was that a quid pro quo? He also took in huge amounts of money from the National Rifle Association (NRA) and then signed a bill into law in Texas that allowed people to carry guns into churches. Was that a quid pro quo?

As long as campaigns are funded with huge amounts of soft money, the appearance of impropriety will surround our political process. It surrounds both presidential candidates. The only solution is to pass campaign finance reform. This is where Gore can be defended because he will sign the McCain-Feingold campaign finance reform bill if he becomes president and Bush will not. That's the bottom line.

Candidates discuss finance reform

Vice President should answer allegations

By Brian Watson

A recent Gallup poll showed that a majority of Americans want Bill Clinton's policy direction intact during the next presidential administration. They don't, however, want any reminders of his character downfalls.

So, leading most national polls, sits Vice President Al Gore, Clinton's right-hand-turned-self-proclaimed "own man." The Veep's character has not been scrutinized, although until a few weeks ago, many questioned his leadership abilities.

If elected Gore will offer his own policy proposals but will certainly work to maintain Clinton's legacy (whatever that may be). Atop his long list of top priorities is campaign finance reform, an issue brought to the forefront by former Republican contender John McCain.

While Gore seems intent on signing legislation regulating "soft money" contributions, voters must ponder his motive. Gore can talk the talk, as he has done with campaign finance reform—it's just too bad his record doesn't stand up.

Maria Hsia, a former Gore aide, was convicted for improprieties related to Gore's trip to the Hsi Lai Buddhist Temple. Gore claims he didn't even know the visit was a fundraiser; in his defense, he does look confused in video tapes from the visit.

But Hsia's conviction doesn't mean Gore is clean. He admits to making solicitation calls from his White House office but says he didn't break any laws. President Clinton believes he didn't break any laws in the Monica Lewinsky investigation, but perjury and obstruction of justice charges may just get him disbarred, if not something worse.

So Gore, who proclaimed himself "his own man" at the Democratic National Convention, showed that he has learned a few things from his mentor. And now the American public must decide if his character can stand the test.

The Veep's obvious plan will be to question Bush on the policy, an issue of which he clearly has the upper hand.

But he won't win respect by claiming to be the champion of campaign finance reform. That moniker goes to his almost-adversary John McCain. The only way he can gain respect on this issue is by admitting his wrongdoing and working harder to understand the issue.

Clinton's approval ratings revitalized after he admitted his mistakes in the Lewinsky affair. Even though the public doesn't want to see Gore regress into his right-hand man role, that may be his only option.

Gore faces campaign finance controversy

By Josh Guyan

Defending Al Gore's campaign finance indiscretions is not an easy thing to do. We've all seen the Buddhist Temple footage and heard about "no controlling legal authority."

One of my favorites was the Vice President's claim to have missed sensitive campaign finance discussions because he was in the bathroom after drinking too much iced tea.

The newest round of indiscretion involves an alleged quid pro quo. Clinton's veto of a tort reform bill for a large contribution from a Texas trial lawyer. Allegedly, Gore had been asked to call Walter Umprey, a Texas trial lawyer with an interest in tort reform, to ask him for money. The White House and the Gore campaign claim he never made the call.

After Clinton vetoed the tort reform bill, Umprey's law firm contributed $40,000 to the Democratic National Committee. This gives the appearance that Clinton's veto was used to raise campaign cash and that Gore was somehow involved. The matter was brought to the attention of the Department of Justice's (DOJ) campaign finance task force, which dismissed the matter after finding no grounds for an investigation.

This, much like the other Gore indiscretions, is not a matter of actually breaking the law (the DOJ ruled that there were no grounds for investigation or prosecution for the Buddhist Temple visit either); it is a matter of the appearance of wrongdoing. This appearance cannot be denied or defended.

But the vice president is not alone. There has never been a proven link between campaign donations and votes or governmental action. Last week the Bison won two Patriot League more games, extending their record to 5-2 and maintaining their five-game winning streak.

On Friday the Bison battled Navy and dominated the first half. Freshman Savannah Rennels was the first to notch a goal for the Orange and Blue, off of a pass from Sarah Klang-Glienna '02, to give Bucknell a 1-0 lead.

With momentum in full swing, the Bison did not wait too long to add another point to the scoreboard. Freshman standout Kristie Simon pulled a chip shot out of her arsenal to score over Navy's charging goalkeeper.

In the second half, Navy fought back from their two goal deficit to tie the game, but Bucknell refused to crack under the pressure of a 2-2 tie.

Simon again showed her talents, stealing the ball from 20 yards out and firing in her second goal of the day and sixth of the season.

The Orange and Blue hung on to beat Navy in a hard fought battle, shooting only 11 attempts to Navy's 12. Defense contributed heavily to the win.

"Our win against Navy was a huge confidence booster, and I think it helped us realize the great potential our team has," Kristen Erb '01 said.

Later in the week the Orange and Blue hosted Lehigh in an exciting match. After 90 minutes of regulation play the game was scoreless. The Bison ladies are no strangers to overtime, as they were boosted by Simon's near game-winning heroics in the final minute.

Her shot in the last minute of overtime play was not blocked by the Lehigh goalkeeper but by the post. In the second overtime Rennels blasted a shot which also ricocheted off the post.

In the final seconds of the second overtime, Tara Uichel '03 hit the post yet again. However, tri-captain Erb was able to collect the rebound and put the ball away for good in the back of the net.

After almost 110 minutes of play, Bucknell finally nabbed the victory and improved its record to 5-2. This is the first time since 1997 that the Bucknell women's soccer team has jumped to a 2-0 record in the Patriot League.

The team attributes its success to its ability to play with confidence in practice and in games. In the Lehigh match Bucknell shot 23 shots on goal to Lehigh's seven.

The captains are helping to keep a positive attitude among the team, and the younger players have stepped up to become leaders and clutch scorers.

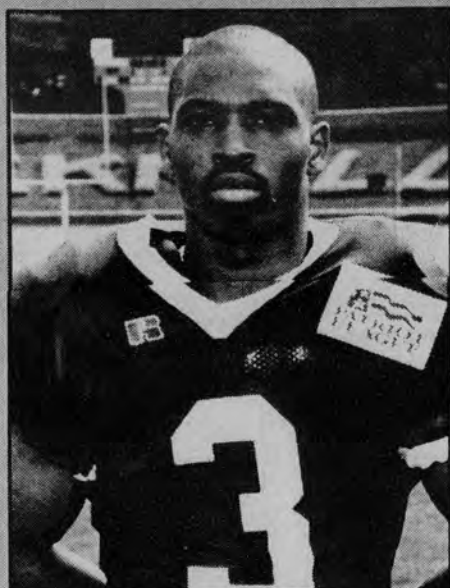

"The freshmen are really fitting into our team and helping it tremendously," Erb said. "They are playing really well and it's great to see them making such a big impact this early."

Friday the team travels to Colgate to try to extend their winning streak to six.

Athlete of the Week:

Jabu Powell '02

By David Tomaio

Jabu Powell rushed for 282 yards this past Saturday against Cornell.

Opposing line-backers have to feel like the "Wile E. Coyote" when they head into Christy-Mathewson Memorial stadium this year, chasing the daunting "Road Runner" played by Jabu Powell '02.

This year Powell is up to his same old tricks, running defenses into the ground with his stifling speed. "Jabu has very good speed, when he finds a crease he explodes," coach Tom Gadd said.

That explosion took place last Saturday to the tune of 282 yards on 30 carries, and a three-touchdown performance on runs of 79.3 and 19 yards. The performance placed Powell in the Bison and Patriot League record books for the most rushing yards accumulated in a single game.

Defenses are finding it difficult to treat Powell like an ordinary running back. "Because of his quickness defenses have to take different pursuit angles to catch him in the open field," Gadd said. This has been the cause of many sleepless nights for defensive coordinators around the league.

Powell leads the league with a robust 7.8 yards a carry average, and is second in all-purpose yards this season. Nationally he ranks 13th in all of division I-AA in total rushing yards.

Bison make 4-0 splash

Water polo drops rival Salem-Teikyo at Bucknell Invitational

By Brooke Rea

The Bucknell men's polo team hosted its annual invitational last weekend and dominated the competition with four wins and no losses.

An important weekend for the long-standing tradition of water polo at Bucknell, the invitational kicked off with the annual Alumni Challenge featuring standout BU graduates Scott Schulte '81 and Jeff Hilk '86. Schulte is perhaps the greatest water polo player in Bucknell history, serving on the U.S. National Team from 1980-1984.

With Schulte and Hilk leading the alumni team, the young Bison were unable to withstand the attack and fell 12-11. With this win the alumni regained control of the coveted alumni cup.

In the first tournament game Saturday morning, BU stomped conference competitor Grove City. The 20-7 victory was a group effort with hat tricks coming from freshmen Jamie Saetele and John Kearny and sophomore Joe Capitan. Eight additional players tallied goals in the contest, with two each coming from Tate Greditzer '01, Stephen Schwanhauser '03 and Chris Saxton '03.

Clearly the Bison had no trouble putting the ball in the net against Grove City, but defense was also critical to their victory. Forced turnovers created counterattack opportunities for BU, and Kearny led the defensive attack with four steals.

The second game of the day seemed to be in the bag from the start, with Bucknell handily defeating Washington & Jefferson 20-11. A strong offensive showing, this game lacked the coordinated defense needed to stand up to tougher teams the Bison will face later in the season.

"Although this game was not a particularly stunning defensive effort," head coach John Zeigler said, "our offensive attack proved to be too much for W & J to handle."

Saetele proves to be a continued offensive threat, tallying three goals along with seniors Chris Kempton and co-captain Justin McCarty, also with three each. Coming in with two assists each were seniors James Mianite, Greditzer and Kevin Permisohn.

The final game of the day Saturday was the much anticipated match up against league foe Salem-Teikyo University, and fans came out in full force to cheer on the Bison. The game proved a frustrating victory for the Bison who, despite more than 20 attempted shots, only managed to eke out a 9-7 victory over the Tigers.

At the end of the first half the Bison faced a 4-4 tie, but two goals from Justin McCarty in the third quarter gave the Orange and Blue the two-goal lead they would hold for the rest of the game. Also instrumental in the win was Greditzer with a late goal in the third quarter and two in the fourth to aid in the Bison victory.

An impressive 22 team steals for Bucknell kept the STU offense at bay with five steals from Permisohn and four from junior Ryan McCarty.

Bucknell's final game of the weekend was a Sunday morning match-up against Slippery Rock University. Strong play by the Bison and major fouls committed by Slippery Rock led to a 19-13 victory for the Orange and Blue.

"The McCarty brothers combined for ten goals in a game short on defense, high on scoring, and high on game ejections due to rough play on the part of Slippery Rock," Zeigler said.

Ryan McCarty contributed four goals in the first half and two in the second, as older brother Justin fired in four of his own during the contest. Other standouts in the game included Permisohn with three goals, three assists and four steals and Greditzer with three goals, three assists and three steals.

Next weekend the Bison face their first league competition at home, with games at 7:00 p.m. on Friday, 9:00 a.m. and 2:00 p.m. on Saturday, and noon on Sunday.

"This weekend is really important," newcomer Saetele said. "We are playing some highly ranked teams and we need to perform well. With the crowd on our side this is really our chance to win."

Princeton will most likely be BU's toughest competition but players and coach alike are confident that teamwork will help them get where they want to be this season. As a freshman, Saetele has a fresh perspective on the team dynamics.

"We're playing well and working hard," he said, "but we need to become more familiar with each other before things will really start to gel."

Men start Patriot League play off on the right foot

By Katie Yingling

According to senior soccer captain Bill Epley, winning the first Patriot League game of the season is perhaps the most key win of all.

Despite a 1-4 record coming into the week, the men's soccer team may have achieved their most important win, setting the tone for the rest of their Patriot League competition when they defeated Holy Cross, 3-2, this past weekend.

The win against Holy Cross was a positive step for the Bison, especially as the team was coming off of a tie against St. Francis last Wednesday and two previous losses from the weekend before.

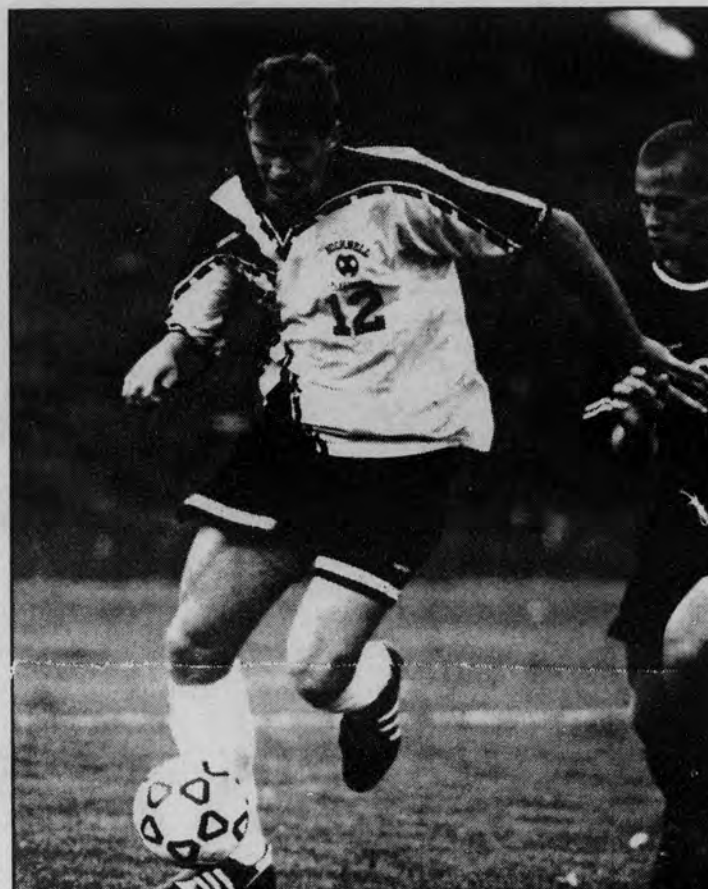

In the game at St. Francis, the Bison battled through two overtimes, but could not place themselves on the board. The game was somewhat reminiscent of last year's meeting: Bucknell and St. Francis faced each other in double overtime game then as well.

Unlike last year, however, the Bison were unable to capitalize on scoring opportunities. With a 14-12 lead in shots after 120 minutes of play, Bucknell left the field with a bizarre 0-0 tie.

When the Bison faced yet another overtime at Holy Cross on Saturday, they were not ready to leave the field without a win. After a scoreless first half, Bucknell placed two balls in the back of the net in the first 10 minutes of the second half.

Freshman Chris Beekman and sophomore Nick Taylor were to thank for the 2-0 lead. Beekman scored off of a cross from mid-fielder Andrew Aurand '02, and Taylor off of a ball from Brian Johnson '03.

Holy Cross was not ready to give up the win so easily, however, and the Crusaders quickly answered the two Bucknell goals with two of their own, keeping the score even at 2-2 for the rest of regulation play.

Captain Bill Epley '01 will lead the Bison against Colgate this Saturday at 4p.m.

When senior forward Sam Graziano scored off a long pass from Ian McVeigh '03 near the end of the overtime period, he gave the Bison what senior Erick Davis called "a desperately needed win."

"The important thing now," Davis said, "is that we take the momentum gained from the game and use it effectively. Colgate comes here Saturday and it is crucial that we build on last Saturday's emotions and claim a second Patriot League victory."

What the Bison do have in their favor is momentum. BU entered the week 1-4, but it ended the week 1-0 with what may have been the most important win of the season. With hopes of upping their Patriot League record to 2-0, the Bison host Colgate on Saturday at 4:00 p.m. and Monmouth on Wednesday at 5:00 p.m.

The important thing now is that we take the momentum we gained ... and use it effectively.

Marshall on pace to rewrite record books X-C excels at PSU invitational

Becki Marshall '02 is leading the Bison this season.
By Brian Klotz

Most students know the drill. You run your laps on the track and finish three sucking air like a vacuum, thinking your eight minute mile must be some kind of record.

live lines were strong points all game. The offensive line was the driving force behind the Bison running game and was nicely complemented by strong blocking by the Bison fullbacks. Said head coach Tom Gadd, "The lines are big every game."

Good defense starts at the line and fans outward, and the defensive line was exceptionally dominating on Saturday. Anchored by Tom Kuhn '01, the line held Cornell to just 26 yards on the ground. Middle linebacker Vince Ficca '01 mentioned that the strong play by the defensive line opened up the field for the linebackers and secondary to make big plays—which they did all afternoon long.

Coming off a tough loss against Richmond in which the Bison could barely muster anything on the ground, a big day for the Bucknell running game was very important. The Bison need to carry their momentum into this Saturday, when they host Columbia.

With pain and suffering fresh in your memory, you head home and read in the sports section that Bucknell's top female runner, Becki Marshall '02, can run a mile in five minutes.

You have just been given a harsh introduction to Bucknell's running program and the incredible athletes within it.

Team captain Marshall may not be like those crazy marathoners on TV, but she's close. In fact, when her running career continues after college, she wants to run a marathon herself.

Marshall's upbeat, happy personality belies the running fiend inside and reflects a deep dedication to her sport that coaches salivate over when recruiting.

In high school, Marshall wanted to do everything. She competed in soccer, softball, tennis, basketball, cross-country and track all within the same year because of her school's permission to double up in each sports season.

Her soccer coach was the first to pull Marshall aside and tell her that never getting tired on the field was a sure sign that she needed to run, or at least try it. Her first running race was the 400 meters, but every year her distance increased until she settled into her best track and field event, the mile. Presently she holds her high school records in the 1500 m (4:46), mile (5:12), and cross country (5 kilometers—18:36).

Coming to Bucknell was a natural choice for Marshall. "I liked the small class sizes, individual interaction with professors, and Coach Gulden's reputation of improving athletes," she said.

Her first year of college running found her watching the magic of two-time Patriot League champ Julie Sweitzer '99, who motivated her to work hard in the classroom and hone her running abilities. Since then, Marshall has been an All-Patriot League selection twice, won the Patriot League meet last year and was on the team that traveled to nationals last season. She also reset her personal records to 4:41 for the 1500m, 5:00 in the mile, and an incredible 17:35 in the 5K.

Coach Art Gulden said of Marshall, "She has a wonderful work ethic and she is a great competitor. When you put those together, you don't have to ask much more of an athlete."

This year, as a junior, Marshall finds herself at the helm of the women's team. "I want to set an example and keep everyone on the team unified and running together," she said of her job, which her teammates would affirm is done very well.

Said Andrea Beisser '03, "I really admire Becki; she has been a great leader for our team this year."

Marshall hopes that she can help lead the team to the national meet again this season.

Maintaining a strong academic standing while running all year, Marshall holds a 3.7 GPA in civil engineering with an environmental concentration. Even when school and academics clash, she keeps the balance.

"Sometimes it's difficult to juggle running and academics, especially at the end of the season when we start traveling," Marshall said. "But if you have to miss exams, the professors are helpful and understanding."

Marshall attributes much of her success in life to her very close family who has supported her through everything. Running-wise, however, she gives a great deal of credit to Gulden.

"He taught me how to have confidence in myself, and since he thought I could achieve my goals, I thought I could too," Marshall said. "He cares about everyone on the team and never focuses on just one individual."

Marshall's important role on the Bucknell running squad was summed up by junior Stephanie Bangor: "Becki is a very dedicated and willing athlete, making her confidence and desire to win reflect not only in her running, but as a team leader as well."

The Bucknell University men's and women's cross-country teams proved their potential last Saturday with strong results at the prestigious Spiked Shoe Invitational at Penn State.

The women's team ran particularly well, finishing in fourth place out of 25 teams with a team total of 115 points, while the men finished eighth out of 23 teams with 252 points.

Junior co-captain Becki Marshall was the Bison's top individual finisher on the women's side, finishing in 14th place with a time of 22:00.20. Theresa Dennis '02 finished 17th with a time of 22:07.23 followed by Andrea Beisser '02 in 19th at 22:08.86. Chris Crowe '02 and Mandy Younell '01 finished 31st and 38th with times of 22:57.70 and 22:47.99, respectively, giving the Bison five of the top 40 runners in the race.

If the times look a little slower than usual for a 5K race, it's because the race was actually a 6K race. "The extra 1000m does in fact make a difference. But we were fearless about the extra distance and were ready to step up to the challenge of running a little longer," Marshall said.

Kevin Weatherill '01 finished as the men's top runner for Bucknell, crossing the line in 43rd place with a 5.2-mile time of 26:45.30. Sophomore Greg Costello was 49th, clocking in at 26:54.26.

Although the men and women's team both ran strong, Gulden thinks there remains room for improvement, especially on the men's side.

"I don't think we ran with a whole lot of emotion on the men's side," Gulden said. "It was a bit depressing to see that, but we just have to bounce back, and we always manage to do that."

The men's and women's cross-country teams will have another chance to excel on Saturday, Sept. 30 when they travel to the Lock Haven Invitational.

New athletic center designs released

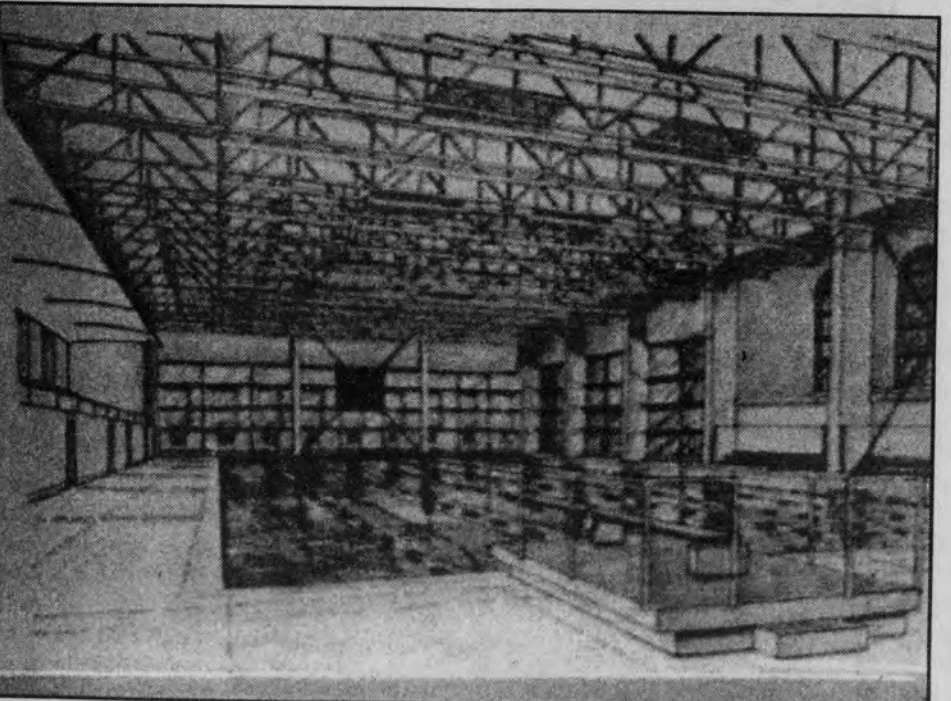

Opening in 2002, a preliminary view of the new state-of-the-art athletic center.
By Carmen Mauriello

Architects from Ewing Cole Cherry Brott updated the campus community Tuesday about the timeline, features and goals of the new Bucknell Athletic and Recreation Center. The state-of-the-art facility, which will include an expanded fitness center, a 54-meter pool and a 3,000 seat arena, is slated to open in the fall of 2002.

The new facility is designed to correct several of the shortcomings of our current athletic facilities. A long-overdue addition is a re-styled natatorium with a 54-meter pool. Freas-Rooke pool is one of the oldest and most outdated pools among the Patriot League schools, and its 25-meter length allowed for little recreational use given the rigorous schedules of the Bucknell men's and women's water polo and swimming and diving squads.

In addition to the competitive advantages of this new Olympic pool for Bucknell's athletes, there will be enhanced recreational opportunities since the pool's size allows for multiple teams to practice at once; there will also be areas sectioned off at both ends of the pool for recreational use.

With the new pool, Bucknellians will be offered more recreational options than ever.

Swimmers lead Olympic surge

By Aaron DeKosa

The Olympic Games are an age-old tradition of pride, glory and superhuman athleticism. Every victory represents a lifetime of hard work and sacrifice. Every photo finish, every gold medal presentation and every individual victory sends a shiver down the spine of viewers all over the world.

But the truth remains: some victories are just sweeter than others.

For American swimmer Tom Dolan there were no words to explain his gold-medal finish Saturday, just unbridled enthusiasm. Dolan finished the 400-meter individual medley with a time of 4:11.76 mark, shattering a record he had set six years ago at the World Championships at Rome with a 4:12.30.

And all he could do in response was slam his hands down into the water in triumphant celebration.

The famed asthmatic swimmer stole America's hearts in 1994 when he broke the world record and joined the rank of athletes like cyclist Lance Armstrong by overcoming physical adversity to reach the top of his profession.

In this particular race, Dolan was troubled with a viral infection that sent him to a nearby oxygen tank after preliminaries earlier that morning.

Dolan addressed the topic saying, "I've been struggling a while with my breathing. But for me, it's all about guts at the end. That's what was able to pull me through."

Playing through pain has never been difficult for Dolan, however, who rebounded from arthroscopic knee surgery last May and endured a 102-degree fever in the 2000 Olympic trials to qualify for the team.

But Dolan wasn't the only athlete to achieve his dream. America's Brooke Bennett and Diana Munz captured the gold and silver medals, respectively, in the Women's 400-meter freestyle.

Bennett, who finally won the gold with a Team 2000 as it overwhelmed China in a 1:19.72 win behind Ray Allen's 21-point performance. For China, the game was viewed as a learning experience as well as a marked improvement after they were trounced by Team USA in the Atlanta games by 63 points.

Things weren't as easy for the American basketball team, who almost dropped their opener to Japan. Leading up to the ninth inning, America was rolling along nicely behind the ace work of Ben Sheets when former New York Met Mike Kinkadee gave up a run scoring error to tie the game and bring it into extra innings. Finally, in the 13th inning, Mike Neill hit a two-run homer to bring the longest Olympic baseball game to a close with a 4-2 American victory. The American women's gymnastics team fell flat on its face, almost literally, with a poor 4th place performance behind Romania (1st), Russia (2nd) and China (3rd).

It seems that pulling Bela Karolyi out of retirement was unnecessary for a team that simply didn't show up to compete. Regardless, the American women did learn an important lesson in teamwork and keeping a positive attitude.

As for the American rowers, it looks like they've come up a day late and a stroke short. Both the Men's and Women's eights failed to secure first place in the qualifying rounds on Monday and both will race again Wednesday. The women's lightweight double sculls, behind Christine Collins and Sarah Garner, overcame a late surge from the Australian team to give America its only first place finish in two days and 14 events of qualifiers.

time of 4:05.80 (after coming up short in Atlanta four years earlier), said, "I wanted it so bad. All I could think about was missing out in '96 and how much I wanted to be in the 400 and the 800 at the Olympics."

As for Munz, she trailed in 4th place for much of the race, only to pull into second in the last 100 meters, finishing with a time of 4:07.07. "It's who wants it the most in the last 100," said Munz. "The last 100 is usually my strength."

And as the race ended, Munz swam over to embrace the emotional Bennett who stood shedding tears of victory into the water lapping around her.

On the basketball court, however, things were not as stressful for the USA's Dream

By Andrew Burr

It's about the time again, late September, when you can tell whether or not a team is a contender just by looking at its stadium.

In some cities, everything is as it always was. People buying food, cheering loud and leaving around the eighth inning to try and beat traffic. In other cities, you wonder if you've stumbled upon a WNB game—no cars, no fans, and the people who are there don't leave after the eighth to beat traffic, there is no traffic.

For many people, the 2000 baseball season may have seemed somewhat routine. But really, it's been one of the most captivating and engrossing seasons in a long time.

With fewer than 15 games left, it's becoming apparent that, once again, the road to the World Series will go through New York and Atlanta. The most impressive thing about these two teams is that they have been able to remain dominant forces in the age of free agency. While Atlanta has relied on one of the best starting pitching stints in history to carry them, the Yankees base their success on the most productive modern farm system in baseball. The common link between these two powerhouses is brilliant team ownership and management.

Elsewhere, matters have not been so constant. Cleveland never really got started this season, but still probably didn't expect to be playing catch-up all year to the White Sox. Although they lead the wild-card race, there are four teams within six games of the Tribe.

Two of those teams, the Red Sox and the Blue Jays, have done outstanding jobs with non-outstanding teams this year, yet may not come away with anything to show for it. The Athletics are closest to overtaking Cleveland but may have a better shot at winning their division against the streaky Mariners.

In the NL, there are three playoff teams from last year that don't look like they will be making a return trip. Of the Reds, the Diamondbacks and the Astros, the Reds are arguably the biggest disappointment.

True, the Astros have fallen the farthest, but they also weren't talking seriously about any world championships in the pre-season. Griffey's early season troubles, combined with disappointing seasons by Pomeroy and Barry Larkin spelled trouble for the Reds back in April.

The Giants did about everything right they could do this year, and now have a comfortable cushion between themselves and the Diamondbacks. Arizona has been inconsistent at best this season.

The Mets lead the NL wild-card, and the possibility of a Subway World Series is intriguing. There's already bad blood between the Mets and Yankees, not only because of their shared territory, but even more so because of the incident earlier this season in which Roger Clemens hit Mike Piazza in the head with a pitch.

NFL Experts' Picks

By Justin McCarthy and Ali Ahmed

NY Jets at Tampa Bay

There were doubts about whether Shaun King could lead the Bucs to the Super Bowl. However, those doubts have all but faded away after his stellar performance against Detroit last week. The Bucs will continue to overpower opponents on the ground and then let King have some fun when needed by letting him pass instead of handing off to Alston or Dunn. The Jets need to find a way to contain the rushing game of Tampa Bay. If the Jets hope to defeat the Bucs they will need to get to King early and often in the game, and they will need to contain Alston and Dunn at the line of scrimmage. The Jets cannot let the Bucs shut down their running game and thus force them into obvious passing situations. Martin has to become a factor early. Ultimately, the Jets chances may depend upon their offensive line, and whether they are able to open holes for Martin and protect Testaverde against an awesome pass rush.

Justin's Pick: Bucs 27-19

This by far will be the most talked about game this week—Keyshawn by himself will make sure of that. Everyone knows he is very very good but he has no right to be badmouthing his former teammates—that can only get them more motivated. Keyshawn though is a competitor and he should have his breakout game this weekend. Also, he will find great satisfaction when the Jets offense will struggle against the awesome Tampa defense. On the other hand, this should also be the first big test for young Shaun King and his improved offense. Can Tampa really score against a top-notch defense? This game should go a long way to show how far Tampa has improved this off-season.

Ali's Pick: Bucs 24-13

Jacksonville at Indianapolis

The Colts defense was their major weakness last year, and last week the Raiders showed that the Colts have not improved much by coming back from a 21-0 deficit to win. The Jaguars will need their defense to step up against Indy and have an outing like last week, in which they recorded their first shut-out as a franchise. Brunell and the Jags though will need to put points on the board in order to keep up with the high-scoring Colts, who are averaging 29 points a game. The Jaguars, at times, may double team Harrison in the secondary, which would take away Manning's favorite target, but it should also free up the middle for Dilger coming off the line or Stewart coming out of the backfield. The loss of Fred Taylor, who has missed the first three weeks, will place the emphasis on Brunell to deliver big. Even though the weakness of the Jaguars offense may be their offensive line, Brunell should be given ample time against a Colts defense that has forced only one turnover and had only one sack through three weeks of play: look for Brunell to pick apart the Colts defense.

Justin's pick: Jags 31-24

Indy has one of the best offenses in the league with Manning, Harrison and James, but they need other players to step up and create a more balanced attack. But even more important is for the Colts' defense to give the offense a chance to win games. Last year, like the Rams, the Colts' defense did what it needed to and was carried by the offense, but this year that is not happening. Jacksonville, on the other hand, is trying to come with injuries but still a very good team. The Jags really do not have a glaring weakness except maybe at running back, but the way McCordell and Smith have been playing, they can afford to wait for Taylor to come back—especially with the way Indy is playing defense. Look for another big game from Brunell. The Jaguars need to step up their passing defense to be successful.

Ali's pick: Jags 30-27

Washington at NY Giants

The Giants are a new and revitalized team this season; they finally have a complete offense to complement their strong defense. Barber and Dayne are bruising opponents—Dayne with his thunderous runs up the middle and Barber with his slashing abilities. The Giants will establish their ground game early, forcing Washington to play the run and thus freeing up room for Collins to throw the ball through. Although he is playing solid, Brad Johnson has made key mistakes in crucial situations, which may cause him to be benched in favor of Jeff George. The Redskins will need whichever QB that plays to lead an aerial assault, because the Giants will crush Washington's running attack; the Giants have the best defense in the league against the run, allowing a paltry 49 yards a game on the ground.

Justin's Pick: Giants 21-10

I don't care what the Giants' record is—Kerry Collins, Tiki Barber and Amani Toomer will not take you anywhere. On the other hand, Washington has not exactly looked great either, which makes this a game between the over-optimistic Giants and the underachieving Skins. I would take great satisfaction in seeing Daniel Snyder cry if the Skins lose again, but they have too many weapons to lose to the Giants. If Johnson struggles again look for Jeff George to come in and play well. Washington's defense might help to help the offense by creating turnovers and getting good field position.

Ali's pick: Skins 27-10

Tennessee at Pittsburgh

The Steelers are horrible this season, although they did show some minor improvements last week. They will look to Bettis to lead them, for their passing attack will be even worse without an effective running game. The Titans will also look to their running back George, although they will look for him to just appear for he has been held in check early on this season. In rushing for only 117 total yards. Both defenses are strong on the run, which will cause this game to be determined by the passing games, and Tennessee has the superior passing attack. Even though McNair had to leave the game last week with a bruised chest, the Titans still had an effective QB in O'Donnell; whichever one plays will surely be better than Graham or Stewart.

Justin's pick: Titans 20-9

Okay, I know that I am going to sound very biased or plain ignorant, but I believe that Pittsburgh can pull off an upset in this game. First of all, if McNair does come back he will not be at 100 percent, and if he doesn't then Pittsburgh fans know very well that O'Donnell's play suffers badly when the game means something. Also, Tennessee has some weaknesses on defense, especially against a power running game, which the Steelers got on track last week with an improving offense line and a rejuvenated Bettis. Also, the Titans haven't gotten on track offensively and it is about time that the Steelers' talented group of receivers started showing how good they can be. Someone just get them the damn ball.

Philadelphia at New Orleans

The Eagles will look to RB Duce Staley for their offensive production; he leads the team in rushing yards as well as in receptions and receiving yards. Basically, he is Philly's only weapon on offense. On defense, the Eagles have a pretty sturdy line that is centered around emerging stars Jeremiah Trotter and Hugh Douglas, who has recorded 5.5 sacks already this season. The Eagles need McNabb to emerge as a force if they hope to go anywhere this season. The new-look Saints will rely on Ricky Williams to lead them; however, Jeff Blake will be able to provide some magic when needed. The Saints need to neutralize Staley at the line of scrimmage and need to keep a close eye on him running routes out of the backfield.

Justin's pick: Eagles 13-7

Everything seemed to go well for the Eagles in Week 1 when they pounded the Cowboys and Duce Staley ran for over 200 yards; but now they seem to be the Eagles of old. Their fans must have been happy to see New Orleans coming up on the schedule, but these Saints are not Dik's Saints and that is a very good thing for them. New Orleans is a much better team than most people give them credit for and they will show it by being competitive in just about every game. Their defensive line is among the best in the league, even though it does not get the attention that the Tampa or Washington lines might get. They also have some good complementary weapons on offense, with deep threats as well as RB Ricky Williams. Look for them to stuff Duce Staley and force McNabb to beat them. It looks like it might be another long game for Eagles fans.

Ali's pick: Saints 23-17

BU Golf Course offers unique experience

Links have seen major facelifts over 70-year history but continue to enchant and challenge golfers

The clubhouse was constructed in 1990 and contains a dining hall. Kevin Logan—The Bucknellian

By Kevin Logan

If you're making your first ever trip to the Bucknell Golf Course, you'll notice something strange. As you veer right off Smoketown Road and appear to approach the course, it appears as if the road to the clubhouse slices right through the middle of a fairway. Wait, make that two fairways. Well, it's no illusion and you're not lost—whether you walk, bike, or drive, you have a view of incoming golf balls as you cut through holes nos. 3 and 11 to make your way to the clubhouse.

Once you've safely passed through, you begin making your way into the clubhouse to pay for your round. You catch a glimpse of waiting golfers fine tuning their games on the putting green just behind the clubhouse and then hear the ping of a soft fairway wood to your left as a student snatches a drive that drops into the bunker to the right of the green on no. 10.

You're reaching to get to the first tee, which lies just on the opposite side of the clubhouse. You walk inside, approach the desk, complete with rows of boxed balls and then pay for your round. Before you grab the scorecard on your way out, you take a look around the pro shop, peak into the dining room and you can just see a golfer through the window teeing off on no. 1. Your anxiety gets the best of you, and you rush out, grab your bag, and head off to the tee, perhaps with a few practice putts in the mix. You then head back into the clubhouse realizing you got yourself so excited you forgot to take that scorecard. Now you're finally ready hit the links for a relaxing afternoon.

HISTORY

The course you're about to play had quite a different look back in 1930. That's the year it was officially opened for play, just 10 months after the land across Route 15 was purchased for that purpose. In fact, it was Homecoming Weekend, making this year's Homecoming the 70th anniversary. Designed by golf architect Emil Loeffler and constructed by his brother Archie, it was originally only nine holes. That nine-hole layout was revamped 17 years later, and it wasn't until 1964 that it was expanded to the current 18-hole format, designed by Edward Ault. Several improvements and additions have been made since then, including the opening of the practice range facility in 1988 and construction of a new clubhouse in 1990.

THE COURSE

Today, the course is a beautiful but short 6,253-yard par 70. The front nine is a picturesque 3,314-yard par 36 with well-protected greens and plenty of trees. The first four holes circle around the clubhouse, from where the golfer must then cross Smoketown Road to play the lengthier final five holes. It ends with a picture-perfect 499-yard par five that slopes downhill on the second shot towards a green guarded in front by a pond with a running fountain in the center.

The 2,939-yard par 34 back nine is significantly shorter than the front, but poses a challenge to golfers off the tee with its narrow fairways. It kicks off with a 192-yard par three, surrounded by trees on both sides. Teasing off facing out from the clubhouse, golfers must try to avoid the sand traps on either side of the narrow green. The par-four 12th hole is also notable, sometimes said to be Bucknell's signature hole. It's an uphill tee shot that runs up to a plateau; longer hitters can drive it past to a flat lie on green level below. The second shot carries a pond to a green with bunkers surrounding it.

So does a short course mean an easy course? According to most, no. "The course is not as long as a lot of the other golf courses that we play in collegiate tournaments," said senior Mike Gale of the Bucknell golf team, "but it requires you to hit the ball accurately. There are plenty of trees on both sides of pretty much every hole, so, if you are hitting the ball off line, you will waste a shot."

Golf team captain Ken Kosteva agreed: "It's very challenging, yard-for-yard. It has tight, small greens—they make it more difficult."

As for the most difficult hole of the course—no contest. From golf pro Ryan Kelly to Gale and Kosteva to pretty much anyone who plays the course, the answer is a resounding "Number Two." Although the par five third is the no. 1 handicap, players seem to be unanimous about hole no. 2. It's a long par three that starts from an elevated tee and looks out over a deep valley to the narrow green 209 yards away. And it has large sand traps on both sides, of course. To make matters worse, Kosteva notes that the pine trees around the green are grown low to the ground. In other words, there's no clearance should your ball stray away from that green. Whereas in many cases you can at least manage a partial swing from under a tree, here chances are slimmer of hitting that good recovery shot and saving par.

THE CLUB

The Bucknell Golf Club itself is a semi-private club, open to both the public and students. It boasts a membership of 492 golfers and 65 student members. Approximately 34,000 rounds of golf are played there each year, which, according to Kelly, is busy for a course located in the North.

It plays host to several tournaments throughout the golf season, including its club championship, member-guest tournament, and the Bucknell Invitational, at which 18 teams competed just this past weekend. This past April, it also hosted the 10th Annual Patriot League Championship.

THE PRICE OF ADMISSION

With 65 student members and many more non-members playing the course, Bucknell students represent a large portion of the tee times reserved throughout the year. And if you play a lot of golf, you know hitting the links often can dig deep into your wallet. So how do these students feel about the $22 greens fees ($26 on week-ends) at Bucknell?

Most believe they're reasonable. As Kosteva explained, the course is "easy access-wise;" at other schools, courses are often private, so students don't have access to play like they do at Bucknell.

However, though the majority feels the prices are fair, students do echo one particular complaint: "There's no nine-hole rate!"

Gale agrees, "I think that a lot of students don't have time to play 18 holes and they think they should be allowed to pay half price for nine holes." And they've got a point—it's not easy to find a free four-hour slot in your busy weekday schedule.

But while there might be a slight debate about the nine-hole issue, the Bucknell Golf Course is a beautiful course and a great addition to the Bucknell campus community. It has attracted golfers of all ages and types—Bucknell and non-Bucknell alike—and is a great part of Bucknell's heritage. So the next time you meander across Route 15 and on over to the links, wish those 18 holes a happy 70th birthday.

Last week's question: Should Bobby Knight have been fired? The ex-Indiana Hoosier head men's basketball coach was known for his "hands-on" training of players. Was his style the reason for his departure from Indiana and was his firing justified?

The votes are back and, according to Bucknellians, the firing of Bobby Knight was a mistake for Indiana University. Most people cited his fiery approach to coaching as a motivational factor to success, while others agreed with his no-nonsense way of coaching. Will we hear from Bobby Knight? Those who support Indiana's decision to fire one of the greatest people in the history of the game don't value self-discipline, toughness and perseverance. All of Knight's players were taught these qualities, which are applicable throughout life. The world wouldn't go around if the ramble—paralyzing Knight opposers ran it. — Patrick Evans '04

Personally, I have no problem with Bob Knight. It seems to me that he's still coaching in the past, when what you did with your team was your business, and I think that he teaches his players discipline and respect. Sure there are a few of his players that don't like him, but on the other hand you can talk all day about the former IU players that have nothing but positive things to say about him (ask Thomas case in point). Just think that in today's world, Bob Knight isn't allowed to make it because the superstar athletes have bigger egos, and they feel like they should be treated differently than everyone else. Bob Knight is a coach from the old school, and he doesn't mind getting on someone's case, no matter how much money they may make in the NBA. — Rob Schmicker '02 decision was far overdue. Knight (I don't have to call him Coach or Mister) has long had a reputation as someone with a sometimes uncontrollable temper, destructive behavior and dangerous habits. Yelling and cursing violent storms, throwing chairs, and choking players might be construed as colorful in my mind, however, it is simply barbaric. — Nick McHain '04

Bob Knight is an old school coach with old school values. His behavior may have been questionable, but it was effective. The true measure of any coach is player respect. Bobby Knight had it, and now Indiana University has lost a great coach; his loss is somebody's gain. Brian Thomas offered Knight a job with the Pacers last summer, immediately upon his dismissal from IU. I think that we'll see Bob Knight on the sidelines again, as harsh as ever, but no longer the subject of IU's prying eyes. — Jeffrey Kalotok '02

Next week's question: Can the New York Mets beat out the Atlanta Braves for the NL East crown?

Bison Honor Roll

—Sophomore goalie Laurie Purse was named the Patriot League Defensive Player of the Week for her stingy goalkeeping in the women's soccer team's wins over league rivals Lehigh and Navy. Purse collected her third shutout of the season in the Bison's two-overtime victory over Lehigh, improving her goals against average to an impressive 1.19.

—Freshman outside hitter and defensive specialist Brandi Trappaso was named the Patriot League Defensive Player of the Week for volleyball. She registered a 4.40 digs per game average in this past weekend's Bucknell Invitational as well as a 2.67 kills per game average. Trappaso was selected by the coaches to the all-tournament team for her outstanding performance.

Cornell player suffers serious concussion, Powell breaks rushing record in BU win

Tim Hermann taken by ambulance after suffering a concussion.
By Cory Nadler

Ten years from now, many people will not remember the record-breaking day that Bucknell running back Jabu Powell '02 had in Bucknell's 38-15 win over Cornell, but they certainly will remember a bone crushing hit by Bison free safety Kevin Eiben '01. After the initial "Wow" that rushed across Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium, there was absolute silence for the twenty minutes that the Cornell Junior Tim Hermann lay on the ground motionless. The good news is that the x-rays on Hermann were negative and physicians expect no long-term effects from the play; it was just ruled a bad concussion. Until his monster hit, Eiben had not played spectacularly. In the first quarter, he fumbled a Cornell punt, which Big Red recovered inside the Bucknell 30-yard line. This led to the first of two touchdown passes for Cornell quarterback Ricky Rahne. This would be the highlight of Cornell's day.

Later in the first quarter the Bison drove 61 yards to tie the score at seven, capped off by a five-yard scoring run by fullback Jason Marrow '01. This was only the beginning of a dominant afternoon for Bucknell running backs.

Most of the Bucknell running was done by Powell, and his 282 yards on the ground earned him Patriot League offensive player of the week honors. Powell set a Bucknell team record as well as a Patriot League record for rushing yards in a single game.

A good chunk of Powell's yardage came on his 79-yard first quarter touchdown run, which gave Bucknell the lead at 12-7. From then on the Bison dominated the game on both sides of the ball.

Cornell looked ready to drive in for another score, but the Bison defense held their ground, and forced the Big Red to miss two field goals late in the first half.

Although the Bucknell offense was very quiet for the entire second quarter, they were able to put three points on the board thanks to a Chris Lundberg '03 field goal, which was set up by the first of three Bucknell interceptions—this one by strong safety Justin Lustig '01. The Bison took a 15-7 lead into halftime, and never looked back.

Volleyball goes 1-3 at BU Invitational

By Pat Evans

Bucknell's volleyball team hosted its annual Bucknell Invitational this past weekend, in which Manhattan, VA Commonwealth, St. Francis (PA) and the University of Stony Brook were all invited to play on the Bison's home floor.

It was somewhat of a disappointment that the Orange and Blue finished fourth overall, managing to win just one match. However, there has been significant improvement which the team hopes to build on in upcoming league play.

"Our consistency and overall play was much better this weekend," said head coach Cindy Opalski.

The Bison opened up with the eventual winners of the tournament, Manhattan Fighting hard, Bucknell struggled early against the impressive Jaspers but heated up later in the match. Apparently the heat came a little too late, as the Bison lost 1-3. (15-8, 15-8, 15-13).

Contrary to their first match, the Bison started out well against a strong VA Commonwealth team. However, Bucknell was unable to finish with the same intensity that they had begun the match with and were defeated. VA triumphed 1-3 over the Lady Bison. (13-15, 15-7, 9-15, 6-15).

After struggling with inconsistency in the first two matches the Bison were ready to turn things around. St. Francis (PA) was no match for Bucknell, as the Orange and Blue won every set.

Improved serving helped the Bison to a 3-0 victory (15-13, 15-7, 15-8). Opalski attributed the win to sound defense, which she called "the overriding factor in the match."

Bucknell faced the University of Stony Brook next, and played strong in every game, outscored by only six points overall in the match. However, the Bison were unable to string together enough games to win and were beaten 3-1 (12-15, 15-7, 7-15, 12-15).

Freshman Brandi Trapasso played extremely well throughout the tournament and earned a spot on the All-Tournament team.

"I was a little nervous being a freshman out there," she said, "but I think I played pretty decently."

Trapasso showed no signs of uneasiness as her excellent play also made her the Patriot League Defensive Player of the Week. She recorded 56 digs and made many critical kills over the weekend.

The Bison fell to Loyola, 3-1, yesterday despite strong performances by Brooke Bader '01 and Shannon Walker '02. The Bison will look for redemption when they host the Subway Classic Saturday.

Bucknell has yet to play a league game, and they are optimistic about how they will perform in their first one at the end of the month.

The Bison look to keep up the progress and overall positive attitude that they have right now, and are improving every day. "If we can execute the way we're capable of, wins and losses will take care of themselves," Opalski said.

Students get intimate with Barenaked Ladies

Fifty lucky Bucknellians travel to CBS Studios in New York City to attend promotional appearance for new BNL album

By Brooke Rea

Any music lover knows the rush that comes with seeing their favorite band play in concert. And even better is an opportunity to see that band in a small venue with up-close-and-personal seating and a casual atmosphere.

This is the treat 50 Bucknell students experienced last Friday when they sat in on a live taping of the Barenaked Ladies (BNL) for CBS' "Early Morning Show." The Barenaked Ladies performance is part of a show that will air this Saturday morning at 9 a.m.

The seats at the taping were made available through a drawing conducted by the CAP Center, and students were required to pay $20 for the performance and roundtrip bus fare to New York City. For the 50 excited BNL fans, the trip was well worth the cost.

At 11 a.m. the bus departed campus for the long drive into the city, where BNL was set to start recording between 4 and 5 p.m. Many eager fans lined up outside CBS Studios, including the large contingent of Bucknell students who had received preferential seating through a connection within CBS.

At 5 p.m. everyone was finally shuffled into the small studio and the Bucknellians filled up the five rows of chairs set up just feet from the stage.

The rest of the room was crowded with other fans who had come to see the taping, making the group in the studio the "largest crowd ever," the show's producer said.

After a brief talk from the producer and a practice applause session, the fans were ready to go. Finally, BNL took the stage and went right into their chart-topping hit "One Week," followed by an introduction and quick chat with "Early Show" host Russ Mitchell.

Mitchell asked about the health of keyboardist Kevin Hearn, who was diagnosed with leukemia in 1998 and is in the midst of making a complete recovery. This performance marks one of the first in which all five band members have been able to play together. Hearn's presence was a noticeable positive force for his bandmates, who applauded his comeback.

Next the band played the first single off of their new album, Maroon, called "Pinch Me." Maroon was released this summer as a follow-up to the quadruple-platinum Stunt of 1998. Since Stunt's release, the Canadian-born BNL have reached unparalleled popularity in the US, and that appeal should only increase with the 12 new songs on Maroon.

Knoebels Grove offers big thrills

Park has been serving the area with laid back, old time style for seventy-five years

By Jim Leahy

On a warm fall or spring weekend, with nothing to do, have you ever wondered if there is anything to do close to the University? Well, there is a place in Elysburg, about 45 minutes southeast of town, that will fulfill all your desires while bringing you back to a day when technology wasn't so prevalent at an amusement park.

At Knoebels Grove, the thrills are real, not computer-driven, and the atmosphere is key to the park. The history of Knoebels dates back to William Penn and 1775 when the Governor of Pennsylvania gave 292 acres of land to John Slater for just over 14 pounds. In 1928, the Reverend Henry Hartman Knoebel purchased the land for $931 and used the land for a tree farm and sawmill. It was his grandson who later turned the property into what exists today, an amusement park.

In 1926, the official Knoebels Amusement Resort opened for business with a quiet lineup of attractions. In addition to a new pool, the park included a carousel, a few carnival style games and a restaurant. The most important ride at Knoebels fits well with the park's history. The Grand Carousel was built in 1913 by George Kramer and contained 63 horses and three chariots. The music came from two organs, made at the turn of the century by separate German firms. It originally was located at Riverside Park in Rahway, NJ, and was moved to Knoebels in 1942. The ride features "rings" that riders can grab as they go around. Although there is no prize for the best ring catcher, it is still worth hanging off your horse while going around one of the oldest carousels in the country.

Knoebels suffered its biggest setback in June 1972. The remnants of Hurricane Agnes moved up the valley and dumped rain on the area. The creeks that run throughout the park spilled over onto the surrounding area and 24 of the park's 25 rides running were all lost and the park was faced with the enormous task of rebuilding. Another huge setback was the mud that covered the entire area. The pool was covered in mud to a depth of six feet and the roller rink was ruined.

After the cleanup was finished, 210 trucks of debris weighing in at around 3,600 tons were moved and the park survived the disaster. In an attempt to strengthen the park following the flood, the staff opened a Haunted Mansion in 1973 that is coaster. But the flagship, as is the case at all amusement parks, is its biggest and baddest roller coaster. The Phoenix opened in 1985 and has brought much attention to the park; a wooden coaster, it has ranked consistently on the top ten list of roller coasters around the world.

The park has a decidedly old world feel. It is truly a grove, with rides and games and restaurants wound through the trees and numerous older style children's rides dotting the landscape. The pool still survives and is now an enormous swimming hole with a slide and diving boards.

The ride to Knoebels is not a problem. And the prices are amazingly cheap. If you go for the day, try to purchase the bracelet that will let you ride everything for one price. If you can only spare a few hours, there are tickets available that will let you get on certain rides for different prices. But those get expensive if your wish is to go a few rounds with the Phoenix or take the plunge on Skioosh.

Although Hershey is not far and Dorney Park is available for those who have the means, Knoebels is the better bet due to its proximity to campus and its reasonable prices. Yes, you can support a local institution that has been serving thrill seekers for the better part of 75 years.

enjoyable and was the most expensive ride that Knoebels has ever built. And the Skioosh, an oversized flume ride, promises to drench any rider. Plus, if you escape unscathed, the bridge from the ride exits puts you in the path of the oversized wave that the boats produce. And don't forget to ride the Twister, their newest wooden roller for release around Christmas time.

The rarely-witnessed group dynamics and banter was a real treat for the fans in the audience, as they got to experience the comedic antics of the band members and interact with them.

A band known for being great in concert, the Barenaked Ladies proved to be an entertaining stage presence, both while playing and in between songs. Despite the brevity of the set and the omission of "old stuff" that many fans were hoping for, the humor and general good vibe of BNL and their fan base made the trip an experience to remember.

Wink Thinks

Dear Wink,

I am the mother of a student and have read your column before. I would like your advice about how to approach my son with a delicate situation. I was pretty young when I had my son and his father and I divorced shortly thereafter. I am now in my mid 40s and have been living with a man. When my son was home this summer we all got along reasonably well, though I can't really tell if my son likes my boyfriend or not. Here is the hard part: I just found out I am pregnant. Although I realize that I am in my mid 40s, I have decided to keep this baby. I am not sure whether or not my boyfriend and I will get married, or even stay together. Wink, I am worried about how to tell my son I am pregnant. What do you suggest?

Sincerely,
Middle Aged Mom

Dear Middle Aged Mom, Let me start out by telling you that if I were your son I would probably freak out. Therefore, I think that you should expect such a response from your own son. Let me clue you into something that I have come to believe in—parents don't have sex. You can try to persuade me otherwise all you want, but I don't want to think about it, nor even hear it mentioned. Try and think of your parents doing that, go on and try for a moment. It's simply unbearable, isn't it? You can't even begin to think about it, nor do you want to. That being said, your son is going to absolutely lose it, mainly because he is going to deny the whole thing. Why, you ask? It's simple. He, like all others, believes that parents don't have sex. He is going to think it's unbelievable. Basically, you are in for some rough times.

To help understand what it is going to be like perhaps you should look at it from your son's point-of-view. He is going to be in college and have a sibling that is going to be at least 19 years younger. What kind of relationship do you think that is going to be? Normal? I think not. While it is ultimately your decision to have this child, being the parent, it is also your job to look out for the child that you already have. Ask yourself what kind of position you are putting your son into.

Additionally, your son is probably going to wonder about your own health. Having a child in your 40s isn't medically advised I don't think, but I am by no means a doctor. Therefore, it is only natural that your son is going to worry about your own welfare.

I honestly cannot think of any easy way to tell someone news like that. Realistically, I can't put myself in your situation. Your son probably isn't going to be able to deal with this at first. I can only imagine that it would take a significant amount of maturity to understand this whole ordeal. What kind of reaction do you think he is going to have? After all you are his mother. Is he going to say, "Oh yippee! I have a new sibling that I can play with. We will be best friends even though we are two decades apart in age." Things just don't pan out that way. In many ways, I am at a loss for words in this instance; I cannot imagine the host of emotions that your son might feel, from anger to fear.

I wish you the best of luck in however you choose to tell your son, but most of all, be prepared for anything. You have put your son in the most awkward of positions and you must be able to deal with the complications you have brought about.

An abroad perspective: A semester in Chile

By Laura Dunn

Earlier this year, I left the wintry air of John F. Kennedy Airport in New York and was enveloped, a mere 12 hours later, by the dense summer heat at the airport in Santiago, Chile.

Santiago, a city with a population near five million, rises beneath a layer of smog and air pollution that hovers over the capital buildings. On a rare clear day one can see the majestic Andes Mountains that rise up along Santiago's borders, but most times, the view remains obscured.

For the first month and a half of my time in Chile, I lived in Valparaiso, a large port city along the Pacific Ocean, home to the Chilean navy. The spirit of Valparaiso lies within the rich colors and cobblestone streets of its 45 populated hills. I soon learned that each hill bears its own name and that people access these hills by using unique slope-climbing wooden elevators called ascensores.

The processes of learning about the area, interacting with families, making Chilean friends and learning to live within the Chilean culture continued throughout the semester, but my experience with the School for International Training (SIT) was a journey characterized not only by the sites and places I visited but also by my gaining a deeper understanding of political tension and conflict. I have since emerged with an appreciation for true democracy.

The painful impact of the Chilean coup and dictatorship still weighs a strong presence in the hearts and minds of Chileans who were tortured and imprisoned because of their political ideology. On September 11, 1973, a military coup overthrew the Socialist government, abruptly ending President Salvador Allende's term in office and his life. For the next 16 years, Chile was ruled by the military and by the dictatorship of General Augusto Pinochet. The dictatorship also remains in the hearts of Chileans whose loved ones "disappeared" during the terror and were never heard from again.

On March 18, my host family and I attended a human rights concert held by family members of los desaparecidos, or "the disappeared." The demonstrators marched and protested, carrying signs that contained enlarged pictures of their lost ones and the words dónde están, or "where are they." Some of Chile's most famous music groups and musicians performed for a group of 60,000 people gathered in the National Stadium in Santiago. Energy rose within the stadium as the crowd jumped up and down in waves shouting "¡Juicio a Pinochet! Juicio a Pinochet!"

Although Chile inaugurated Ricardo Lagos (the first Socialist president since Salvador Allende) this past March, the country remains in great political divide between the left (those opposed to Pinochet) and the right (those in favor of Pinochet). My leftist

It does not seem that the citizens of Chile will forgive or forget the events that occurred in Chile between 1973 and 1989 for several generations to come. Many Chileans today don't see any hope for reconciliation between the left and the right.

During the second part of our program, we were given the opportunity to live with Mapuche families. The Mapuches are indigenous peoples in Chile who make up about 10 percent of the country's population and mostly live in southern Chile and Santiago. Today, the majority of Mapuche live in cities because their lands are being taken over by big forestry companies. The construction of new highways divides their land and currently a company known as RALCO is building a hydroelectric dam in the Bio Bio river that will, through flooding, destroy Mapuche homes and sacred burial sites.

Mapuches are also attempting to preserve their language and culture for their children. Last May, I researched the topic of Intercultural Bilingual Education and observed how the Mapuche culture and language (Mapudungun) are being integrated into the classroom. Through observations in ethnic nursery schools and bilingual classrooms, as well as through interviews with teachers and professionals in national offices, I not only learned the complex task of the Intercultural Bilingual Education, but also realized its place as one of the few ways to preserve the Mapuche culture and language for future generations.

In Temuco, a city located nine hours south of Santiago with a surrounding landscape not too different from the rolling uninhabited hills of Pennsylvania, I lived with two different Mapuche families over a period of three weeks. When I arrived at the home of the family with whom I would stay in Temuco, the little four-year-old girl Askin began to call me "Winka." Everything non-Mapuche is referred to as Winka and I was the first Winka person whom she had ever met.

or running water. Without these conveniences, simple processes like cooking, doing dishes, and laundry and showering become lengthier, more complex tasks.

A typical day consisted of waking up at 6:30 a.m., taking the family's four cows to a grazing pasture 45 minutes away, eating breakfast (usually bread and tea or toasted flour mixed with boiled milk, a mixture that tastes similar to oatmeal), working on the construction of a barbed wire fenced to protect land to be used for the cultivation of native plants and making "Chi Chi," the Mapuche version of hard cider.

By the time my stay in Chile ended, the insight that I had gained into human rights issues—from political tension to indigenous struggles—had given me a new perspective through which to view life, the history that we have created for ourselves and

My most memorable experiences from these home stays, however, occurred within the five days that I spent living with a Mapuche family in the countryside near Temuco. In the United States, we become so accustomed to our technological luxuries that it is difficult to imagine living without refrigerators, bathrooms the multiple ways that we can shape our future. When I first landed to greet the warm air outside of the Santiago airport, I did not know how my studies would amaze me; or how they would open my eyes to perspectives and people that would continue to hover, fog-like, within my memory.

Lewisburg Sampler to showcase area's housing history

Parent's Weekend tour will provide participants with a glimpse of the past and an idea of Lewisburg's development

By Katie Hays

A home's value defies measurement; it is a testimony to the past, a revealing remnant of the people who live and die in it.

Such seemingly over-sentimental expressions reveal their origins through events such as the Lewisburg Sampler 2000 House Tour, slated to take place Saturday, Sept. 23 from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Community-dwellers, history buffs, and families united for the University's Parents Weekend will embark on the tour to explore the idiosyncrasies and attractions of the area's beautiful historic homes.

One such home along the tour currently belongs to Kenneth and Hope LeVan. Ironically, the LeVans have relied upon modernity's wonders in order to verify the historical appropriateness of their home's décor. Through careful "net-surfing," they acquired copies of pre-World War I publications including House Beautiful and a genuine 1908 Sears Roebucks and used the magazines to identify and purchase their home's furnishings from antique specialists all over the United States. After the meticulous research of the LeVans, the public will step into a home reminiscent of 1916 Lewisburg life.

The house is no intricate Victorian "gingerbread," adorned with frills and delicate intricacies; rather, its Colonial Revival Style revolts against such excesses, stressing simplicity instead. Its brick exterior stands formally, and subdued-color stained-glass windows filter soft light to the home's spacious interior.

The dining room, into which such sunlight falls, supports the theme of balance, simplicity, and symmetry. Two corner cupboards flank the room's wide window, allowing light to reflect on the sets of glassware designed by the LeVan family.

A looming 1923 gas stove called a "Universal" stands as the centerpiece of the home's 1916 kitchen, and the refrigerator replicates a period ice box whose rear compartment the "ice man" could refill without ever entering the house. The kitchen's sturdy kitchen chairs mimic those sold by Sears in 1908 64 cents.

Such details may not interest the humanist so much as the home's original owner, Mrs. Dreisbach, whose obsessive attention to cleanliness and accessibility led her to paint the kitchen a blinding white, to insist on excessively wide doorways, wide and easy-to-climb steps on the main staircase and an elevator to the second floor.

As was traditional for prosperous merchants of the period, the home's third floor remains open and airy, and was built as a ballroom. Now, however, Kenneth and Hope LeVan have again combined modern technology with the fragments of the past; they furnish the historic room with state-of-the-art electronic equipment that aids them in their work designing China.

Nestled within this house of elevators, sixty-four-cent chairs, and stained glass windows lies a miniature world; a shelf runs the length of the third floor room, and there, dozens of tiny houses gather in a self-contained universe.

A microcosm of a 1900s, the town is a frozen spot of time complete with rising churches and storefronts. The LeVans created the original buildings through the use of wood and cornhusks. Some of tiny homes are replicas of existing full-size buildings, while others are solely fictional.

Besides the unique LeVan Home, the Lewisburg Sampler will feature buildings of several time periods: a small Japanese shrine, a church with beautiful stained glass, large freshwater aquariums, and a cupola from an old building in Mifflinburg are

One of the many historical homes and buildings in Lewisburg.

Spotlight on Lewisburg shops bringing students to downtown area

Booksellers offers a convenient escape for avid readers

By Katie Heise

Weary of the selection at the Bookstore or frustrated by high prices? Looking for a friendly, relaxed, off-campus atmosphere in which you can comfortably read or study? Or are you driven by a sudden nostalgia for your childhood days, when Winnie the Pooh and Clifford the Big Red Dog stood at the pinnacle of all true literature? Your search can end at the corner of Market and South Fourth Streets where Booksellers, one of Lewisburg's hidden gems, provides the books, prices and atmosphere that you may seek.

A small, locally-owned store, Booksellers carries an impressive array of books ranging from bestsellers to politics, and from spirituality to the classics. The store's unique charm becomes evident immediately upon entering. The soft but bright lighting creates an inviting atmosphere for the avid reader and the shelves host a small spectrum of great literary works. After a friendly greeting from the staff, the customer can browse, buy or simply curl up in one of the padded, throne-like chairs to relax with an old favorite or a new discovery.

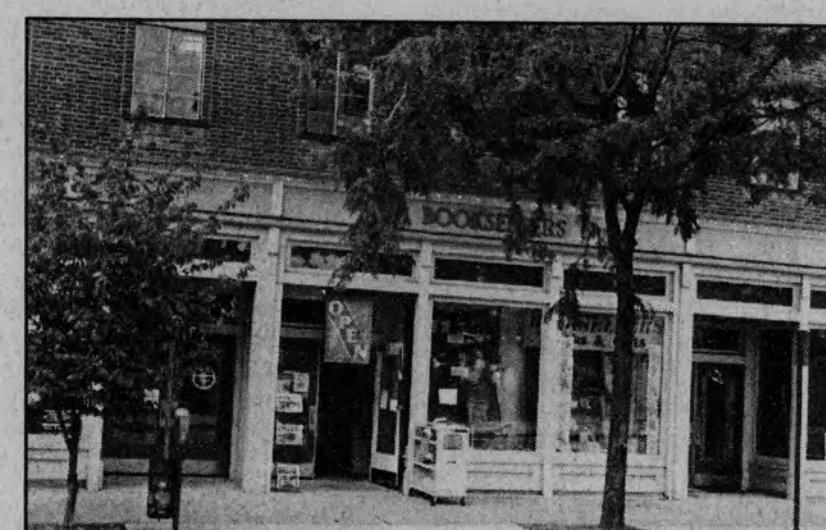

A little exploration reveals the brightly colored children's area, complete with toys and child-sized chairs, and taking a few steps more, you will find the lower level where many of the fiction books are located, under the watchful eye of a life-sized Captain James T. Kirk of the original Star Trek.

The lower level of the shop houses the computer books, the biographies and the large print volumes, among many others. This room has the feel of a tiny library; it is homey and welcoming, with books and magazines displayed casually on tables and desks, inviting the customers to explore to their heart's content.

On Thursday and Saturday mornings, college students will encounter something new and different—a true journey back into childhood. Every Thursday and Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m., Booksellers

Purple Platypus urges passers-by to remember their youth

By Shannon Lack

It's all about uniqueness, but most people can tell that just from the name. The Purple Platypus is a small, colorful building that brightens Market Street and overflows with all the toys you were sure you would never see again.

Their focus is creativity—there really isn't a toy there that hinges upon anything else. The Purple Platypus is about growing as you learn and it doesn't matter whether you choose to learn with Hello Kitty, glow in the dark stars or a sequined skirt and a hand-puppet. It's all the same. The sparking of the imagination denies all boundaries and The Purple Platypus knows it.

First, the name begs some explanation. Where did it come from? What does it mean? The owner, Joyce (Jodi) Geise, is the mastermind behind this catchy title. Obviously, "purple" fits because it's a wonderful and loud color, but platypus! The store is unique, and focuses on the differences of all types of children and the platypus' body is very diverse, composed of an otter's torso, a beaver's tail and a duck's bill. The diversity of the platypus is very important to the essence of the toy store.

The name represents all of the qualities the store strives to maintain. So a Purple Platypus truly encompasses this diverse, fun and unbelievably unique store full of toys to learn and grow.

When you enter the store, Beanie Babies, Playmobile figures and other "specialty toys" smile at you from all sides. Appropriately called "specialty toys," they are the toys that no Wal-Mart or local mall carries. The toys found at The Purple Platypus are the ones you used to carry around with you when you were little; they were your treasures, and now they have returned. These toys attract infants and adults alike interactions that create the friendly aura inside the store.

In November 1988, Lewisburg acquired something wonderful: an innovative store geared towards learning and the encouragement of diversity. At one point, a customer came in desperately in need of a particular toy. Geise excused herself to personally search for this greatly needed item. When it couldn't be found they offered advice on where else to look for it and even gave her a number to purchase the toy over the phone.

This kind of dedicated behavior illustrates how The Purple Platypus brings personal service to a whole new level. At Christmas, they are truly Santa's helper and now, as a new school year begins, they are every teacher's best friend.

The Purple Platypus is a store where jump ropes, "dress up" clothes and interactive role-playing games juxtapose; the store's toys connect under the common theme of fun and learning. As I browsed the store, three Bucknell students entered and began playing with various puppets sold there. I smiled, because I realize that I am not alone.

We love to play. Even me, at my age, cannot resist running my hand along the bottom shelves that hold toys that sparked my imagination as a child and that still remind me of the feeling. And of course, I did not leave empty handed.

At the Purple Platypus, who can't Dispatch, the Massachusetts band formerly known as One Fell Swoop, brings their intoxicatingly original sound to campus on Sept. 30. Bucknell's chapter of the national fraternity Delta Upsilon (DU) will host the upcoming event and they promise an impressive concert.

Dispatch, who self-branded their sound as "tri-vocal funkcoptic instrument swap-groove," consists of three band members: Brad Corrigan, Pete Heimbold and Chad Urmonst. The band gives a restless performance throughout their performances as they frequently swap instruments and switch between both acoustic and electric set-ups. Having sold over 16,000 records, much of the group's popularity stems from their live performances.

By Natalie Casp

Already on two major motion picture soundtracks and awarded "Debut Album of the Year-Major Label" (Capitol Records) at the Boston Music Awards for their latest CD, "After the Party," the Push Stars brought a taste of their talent to Uptown Friday night. Playing for nearly two hours, the Push Stars fed off the students' energy and entertained the crowd with songs from both their recent and upcoming releases.

Formed by chance, the members of the Push Stars describe their music as happy and upbeat. Drummer Ryan MacMillan said, "We're not pissed off at the world or anything. It's just real stuff."

Shortly after meeting, the three musicians created demo tape. "We recorded a tape, liked it and it felt real honest to us. It felt really natural without much effort," said lead singer and songwriter Chris Trapper. Playing for a live audience also comes naturally for the band. "We always practiced in front of the public. We don't have a practice space, so we gauge it [a new song] on the immediate reaction of the crowd," Trapper said.

The creative process comes easily to the Push Stars. In just one day, the group recorded eight original songs for a demo. Trapper said, "I wrote a song, they wrote their parts and we demoed it in one day. It's never really taxed or laborious, it just flows." Nods of agreement came from the other two members. "It's like soup-if you put too much spice in it, you ruin it," bassist Dan McLoughlin said.

In just five years, the Push Stars released three albums, opened for musical giants like Everclear, The Red Hot Chili Peppers, The Samples, Vertical Horizon, filled clubs around the country and played smaller venues on their own.

Even with the exposure brought by touring with big-name groups or playing in prestigious clubs, the band prefers performing for smaller venues like Uptown. "Club life and college life are two different worlds. At clubs, there are fights and punk bands. We try to bring elegance," Trapper said. "At colleges, the students have more respect for the musicians," McLoughlin added.

Smaller venues full of energetic fans excite the Push Stars. "We did a show in front of 20,000 when opening for the Chili Peppers—it's not about the number [of people] there, it's about how many are excited to see us. It's 25 people there like us, that's cool. It's not the size of a room or venue, but the energy of the people. It can happen here tonight [at Uptown], it can happen in a dorm room. Just get rid of the hoopla and hype and have fun," McLoughlin said.

But with more exposure and increasing popularity, the Push Stars are finding more than 25 fans in an energetic crowd. With songs on the soundtracks of "Me, Myself and Irene" and "There's Something About Mary," the band feels that their music reaches more people. "We went to a movie opening in Providence, RI, and were with a bunch of people were just going nuts when our song came on," Trapper said.

McLoughlin, too, feels more accomplished now that their music appears in blockbuster movies. "The first time, it was amazing when you do a song, it means something to you, but when it's put to a picture it means something to other people too," McLoughlin said.

With the release of their third album and another planned for early 2001, the band feels the pressure of show business. "It's a roller coaster, this business," Trapper said. "We hear crickets chirping and we're like, 'Is anything happening?' and then we'll be hot for a month."

McLoughlin agrees. "We can't get too excited about things. Your quest for whatever you want to accomplish is always there. You have ups and downs and a big wave sweeps over you, but you have to stay grounded."

Now that the band hears their music on the radio or when in public, maintaining composure requires restraint. MacMillan said, "Sometimes we walk into McDonalds and we hear ourselves." McLoughlin mused, "And on that occasion—we supersize."

Eating disorders skewed by media

By Jennie Scheerer

You see them walking down runways in New York City and Paris. You see them in commercials, on television shows and in movies. Their images are displayed on countless magazine covers and giant billboards. Who are these people? They are the ultra-thin celebrities and models of our society.

Over the past two decades, eating disorders (especially anorexia and bulimia) have become more and more visible and have been identified as serious problems. The media has informed the world about famous athletes and performers who have died as a result of their eating disorder. However, aren't they being a bit hypocritical when on one page of a magazine we read an article about someone suffering from anorexia, but then on the next page we see a clothing advertisement displaying an extremely underweight woman?

Why have the people of today's society, specifically women, become so obsessed with fitting this perfect ideal of beauty and thinness? I believe that part of the problem comes out of the media and its false portrayal of the "typical" woman. The body type of this "typical" woman contained in magazine advertisements and on television actually represents less than one percent of the population. Several talk shows have attempted to create an awareness of eating disorders.

Oprah once had a guest named Rudine, a woman who had been battling anorexia for 20 years. Oprah was able to check in with Rudine over the next couple of years; at times she seemed to be recovering while at other times she seemed to be near death. Sadly, Rudine died in 1995,

Many celebrities have recently come forward to inform the public about their own struggles with eating disorders. They include Princess Diana, actresses Ally Sheedy, Tracey Gold and Jane Fonda and gymnasts Cathy Rigby and Nadia Comaneci.

While the public is beginning to understand the severity of eating disorders, it still seems as if the "waif" look is a prerequisite for media survival in Hollywood. The media tries to inform society, especially adolescents, of the dangers of eating disorders. However, they are also very harsh on celebrities who do not embody this ideal of extreme thinness. When she made the film "Clueless," actress Alicia Silverstone was a slender 15-year-old. Before filming her next movie, "Batman and Robin," Alicia put on five or ten lbs. over a few years and she was absolutely torn apart by the media. After her appearance on an awards show, where critics noticed the small weight gain, she was subjected to headlines such as "Batman and Fat-girl" and "Watch out Batman, here comes Buttgirl." Titanic star Kate Winslet, who is curvy but not overweight in any sense, faced similar abuse when called "Tri-Tonic" and "Chubby" by the press.

In a recent People magazine survey, 18 percent of those polled would swap bodies with celebrity Halle Berry.

The images of models and actresses will probably not change any time in the near future. However, people (especially adolescent girls) must be made aware that most of these pictures are digitally enhanced and airbrushed, and not at all representative of the ideal woman.

prepared to receive the next blow." Kamtman explained, and as the participants of the workshop got fired up, it was sometimes necessary to remind them not to become overzealous. Kamtman took the group through basic moves such as slapping, punching, fainting, falling backwards, hair pulling and choking. He splitting the room into pairs and designated each pair with an "A" and "B" to distinguish roles. He coached the pairs on how to make noises to accompany the strikes, with appreciative sounds from the other members at the reality of the moves. He also demonstrated the more complicated moves with volunteers from the group.

Once the pairs had the opportunity to practice all the building-block moves, Kamtman choreographed a short "phrase" of fighting. The members at this point were very enthusiastic and the room echoed with grunts, groans, the occasional expletive and incredible laughter as they practiced and watched one another wrestle.

"Let's focus on accuracy and partnership, guys, and remember to keep on breathing," Kamtman said in his open and welcoming way. His instructing and directing methods were very relaxed and seemed to broadcast the very same safely controlled enthusiasm he was teaching. It was obvious that the participants responded to his manner, judging by the performances of the pairs; each pair ran through the fight-phrase for the rest of the group. It was apparent that a supportive community had formed within a two-hour period of time—the members of the workshop hooted and hollered, clapped, "ooh-ed" and "ahh-ed" over the antics of each pair. But most telling of the success of this workshop was the predominant sound of laughter.

Kamtman was asked if there was any particular event that stood out in his mind as the turning point when he decided to pursue a career in the performing arts. He thought for a moment, remarking that there were numerous occasions, but proceeded with the story of an experience that each person has had in one form

Nashville Symphony Orchestra to play Weis Center

The Nashville Symphony Orchestra, featuring crossover fiddle superstar Mark O'Connor, will open the Weis Center's season Saturday, Sept. 23, at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center for the Performing Arts at Bucknell University. Tickets are $20, available from the Weis Center box office.

Conductor and music director Kenneth Schemmerhorn will lead the orchestra in works by Beethoven, Richard Strauss, the American composer Charles Ives and O'Connor.

"I'm personally thrilled that the orchestra is performing live! 2nd Symphony, a grand piece of Americana which has never before been played in the Weis Center," said Bill Boswell, director of cultural events at Bucknell. "Listeners will hear references to and snippets of many familiar patriotic songs, hymns and tunes including 'Campion Races' and 'Turkey in the Straw.' The five-movement work ends with a grand statement of 'Columbia the Gem of the Ocean.'"

"Another highlight of this opening concert is a performance by fiddler Mark O'Connor, one of America's most gifted contemporary composers, who will perform as soloist in three of his own works," he said.

Under the dynamic leadership of Schemmerhorn, the Nashville Symphony Orchestra has flourished, with popular renown coming when the orchestra performed the soundtrack of the PBS mini-series "Liberty! The American Revolution." The orchestra was featured on the Sony Classical CD "Liberty!" along with James Taylor, Yo-Yo Ma and Wynton Marsalis.

Tickets for Weis Center events are available from the Weis Center box office in person in the Weis Center lobby or by phone by calling 570-577-1000. The box office is open Tuesday through Friday 11:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. Tickets also can be purchased one hour before each performance.

Brian Setzer keeps swingin'

By Campbell Gerrish

This past summer, the creator of what became the '50s swing dance revival anthem, "Jump, Jive and Wail," filled record stores with another high-intensity, classic swing jazz album.

Brian Setzer, long time purveyor of the original finger-snapping, upbeat '50s sound, and his orchestra have put together Vavoom, another compilation of classic tunes along with plenty of originals that will have even the meekest of party-goers out on the floor at least trying to do the pretzel.

The Brian Setzer Orchestra pounds out a bunch of old swing classics, treasured as favorites by many of the original swingers (our grandparents), such as "Americano," "Caravan," "Mack the Knife" and others, with a fresh new energy that gets the old folks all nostalgic and us limber young folks away from the bar and onto the dance floor.

The Orchestra also includes a slew of originals that stick to the classic style. "If You Can't Rock Me," "Drive Like Lightning" and "The Footloose Doll" are my personal favorites on the album. "Drive Like Lightning" is a deep, bassy, tremolosurfi-guitary, greaser song. When you hear the opening notes of "You Can't Rock Me," you'll swear you've heard the song a million times. It's a swing standard revamped by Setzer, adding a lot of energy in the horns and plenty of ripping guitar.

Finally, while preserving a good amount of traditional stuff and sending it on into the new millennium, Brian Setzer doesn't hesitate to test out some new flavors, infusing modern rock styles with swing. "Pennsylvania 6-5000," starts out with a funky sampled beat and then blasts into a thumping bluesy jazz bit. Also, there's "Jumpin' East of Java" which sticks more with jazz tradition but includes tons of walling guitar riff's from Setzer, giving the tune a more

Any fan of jazz and swing dancing should hurry to the music store and pick up a copy of Brian Setzer's Vavoom—it'll liven any party.

Food for Thought: Nutritionists show that diet affects mental ability

By Cheryl Myers

You were up late the night before studying, but when you sit down to take your test the next morning you can't remember anything. Could this be related to what you ate for breakfast?

There actually could be some correlation, and it gives a whole new meaning to the phrase "you are what you eat"—at least academically. Researching the relationship between the foods we eat and our mental capabilities is a growing field of study called nutritional neuroscience. For everyone, especially students, understanding how certain nutrients can affect memory has profound implications.

A group of frequently mentioned nutrients are antioxidants. The brain uses a significant amount of oxygen, but reactive forms of oxygen can damage brain cells or neurons. Antioxidants reduce the amount of stress that is put on neurons, preventing damage to cells and allowing them to function properly, reports Psychology Today. Foods that are high in antioxidants include green and black teas as well as fruits and vegetables, such as blueberries, spinach, tomatoes, broccoli, and strawberries.

Foods that are rich in B-vitamins are also beneficial to cognitive functioning. Research from Tufts University suggests that high levels of various B-vitamins are necessary for mental dexterity. A variety of foods contain B-vitamins, including fruits, leafy vegetables, legumes, beef, poultry, fish, cheese and seafood.

The amount of fat in a diet is always an important issue. Generally, North Americans consume too much saturated fat and not enough essential fatty acids (EFAs). One group of EFAs are the n-3 fatty acids and are found in fish, as well as in cooking oils such as canola, soy and walnut oils. The n-3 fatty acids are vital for proper development of the human brain and protect the brain from damage. According to Psychology Today, people who fail to consume enough n-3 fatty acids may suffer from depression.

Caffeine is always tied into the debate of substances that help or hurt the process of committing information to memory. Current studies from the U.S. Army Research Institute of Environmental Medicine show that caffeine helps to sustain attention during various mental tasks. It works by inhibiting the chemical adenosine, which calms the brain. If used in moderation, foods and beverages containing caffeine are safe.

Sugar, mainly glucose, can also be surprisingly beneficial, but it is difficult to determine the dose that will produce the optimal mental effects. Research from the University of Virginia demonstrated that students who consumed 200 calories of sugar before taking a reading retention test showed an enhanced performance. Hormones that aid these memory functions work by raising glucose levels. A proper quantity of glucose can improve long-term memory, but this amount is dependent on several factors, many of which cannot be accurately measured.

All of this means that staying healthy by eating a balanced diet based on a variety of foods is essential for optimum brain function. Fruits and vegetables are especially important, but favorites like sugar and caffeine can also be beneficial when they are not consumed in excess.

'Don't worry, I'm on the pill'

By Matt Albert

In the heat of the moment, these words can come as music to a man's ears. The women's birth control pill is seen not only as an invitation to unprotected sex, but puts nearly all responsibility for preventative measures upon the woman's shoulders.

Times are changing. Scientists have made a giant step in recent weeks toward development and commercialization of a male version of the traditional birth control pill. The goal is to stop the male production of sperm in much the same way as the pill stops egg production in women.

There have been many attempts in the past to provide men with a birth control pill, but those efforts often had unacceptable drawbacks, such as toxicity, impotence and infertility.

When the women's pill was released 35 years ago, it ushered in a new era of sexual relations, one where the woman could control her pregnancy risk and not be dependent upon the man to wear a condom. Now, this luxury will be accessible to men. Though all men could be eligible for the pill, it will most likely be a viable option for older, married men who do not want to undergo a vasectomy or continue wearing protection.

Birth control for men could be widely available in as little as five years. The most recent demonstration of the effectiveness of the male birth control pill has jointly taken place at the University of Edinburgh in Scotland and at the Shanghai Institute of Family Planning Technical Instruction in China. At both locations, researchers have found a way to suppress daily sperm counts without major side effects. Their method to curve sperm production is surprisingly similar to that used by the female pill.

For 24 weeks, some 30 men at each location were given around a 300 milligram dosage of a synthetic hormone called desogestrel, one of the main components in the female birth control pill. In essence, desogestrel stops the production of sperm in the same way as it inhibits ovulation in women.

Along with the synthetic hormone, the subjects were given one injection of testosterone at the beginning of the study and another 12 weeks later.

At the end of only 16 weeks of treatment, those men in the 300 milligram bracket saw a complete suppression of sperm production. On top of this success, a group of 11 men volunteered for an additional 24 weeks on the pill. The subjects used no other contraceptives apart from their daily oral doses of desogestrel coupled with testosterone injections at 12-week intervals. All 11 men completed the extended survey with zero production of sperm and no report of pregnancy in their partners.

Perhaps the best and most comforting news for all men came in the weeks following the study. After stopping their usage of remains psychological rather than scientific. It is clear that science will inevitably perfect this new drug, but no one is certain that the male population will consent to change their ways and take the birth control responsibility. In the end, it is still not the man that is left with the job of childbearing if an accident does occur. If the male pill is the sole means of protection for a sexually active couple, the woman must trust that the man will take his daily dose at the same time each day. Though not impossible, after generations without this ritual it may be difficult to engrain it into the routines of the male population.

Apart from the hype of the wonders of the male pill, there are still some significant dangers that must be addressed, the first and foremost being sexually transmitted diseases (STDs).

Though the advent of this new "wonder drug" may decrease the risk of pregnancy, it will give no help in the fight against STDs. "People underestimate their STD risk," said Nurse Practitioner Roz Yannaccone of Student Health Services, more affectionately known as the "Condom Lady." "The pill [of either gender] gives no protection." The pill may stop pregnancy, but the condom remains one of the best measures to prevent STDs. In fact, the reality that a man may never have to wear a condom again can lead to a significant increase in the number of STDs.

Another issue is the threat of cancer. There is evidence that women on the pill have an increased risk of breast cancer. This risk applies to men as well. An increase in testosterone levels, needed while taking the male pill, has already been linked to prostate cancer.

With these drawbacks and the possible unwillingness of men to take the pill, pharmaceutical companies have been hesitant to jump into the male birth control market. The federal budget for research on the male pill is only $3.75 million, as opposed to the estimated $100 million for the female version.

Nonetheless, it appears that the male birth control pill has enough momentum and public curiosity that it will hit the market and affect the sex lives of millions within only a few years.

This leaves us men only a short time to prepare ourselves for that question at the crucial point during the evening: "Matt, are you on the pill?" For now, however, that question is still ours to ask.

The real challenge for the pill, however,

Patriot League to vote on scholarships

By Brian Watson

Critically acclaimed sports commentator John Feinstein saw the Patriot League as perfect fodder for his most recent work.

The Last Amateurs, set for release in early November, chronicles a season of Patriot League basketball, a topic that intrigued Feinstein because the players "didn't get much attention but stuck to the basics"—they play for the love of the game, not the scholarship money.

But shortly after the book's release, the Patriot League will take a hard look at its current policy and may opt to allow scholarships, changing The Last Amateurs from documentary into would not be binding, but "will precipitate the conversation."

He and Athletic Director John Hardt stressed the importance of maintaining the University's long-standing relationship between athletics and academics.

"This is not just an athletics issue, rather this is a campus-wide issue. What's important now is that we have meaningful discussions and engage in dialogue with the various constituencies on campus to make a policy determination that is in the best interest for the entire school," Hardt said.

Hardt interprets the league already have different financial aid options, but in the collegial method of policy making, we should attempt to develop a position and a plan that is right for Bucknell and a product of campus consensus," he continued.

Hardt interprets the reemerging discussion over the possibility of expanding the permissibility of merit-based scholarships in the conference as a "natural evolution of league policy" regarding an issue that has stirred controversy in the past several years.

With the league's addition of American University last spring, the other schools were forced to reexamine their stance on increasing merit-based aid; American has maintained its policy of offering full athletic scholarships despite the conference's hesitation to initiate similar programs.

American sits on one side of a long spectrum—on the other extreme sit Bucknell and Colgate, which have never offered merit-based athletic aid. Holy Cross

Ferraro holds downtown forum

Downtown student residents voice concerns in a mandatory meeting with Deans

By Heather Napolitano

At a mandatory meeting last Tuesday night, Dean of Students Richard Ferraro addressed University students living off-campus on the recent conflicts occurring downtown.

In this forum, students also had the opportunity to express their concerns and openly engage in dialogue with Ferraro and the associate and assistant deans of students.

"This meeting is about trying to get a hold on what's going on downtown and find a compromise," Ferraro said, "not to point fingers."

According to Ferraro, the Lewisburg Police Department and the University have received a myriad of complaints about the activity in the borough. The individuals coming forth with complaints are not limited to residents, however; medical personnel, faculty and even students have expressed concern and frustration.

The most evident problem occurring downtown is the level of noise that often continues into the early hours of the morning. Yet Ferraro believes this is not the primary concern. Fist fights, people being hospitalized for alcohol poisoning, people so intoxicated they are unable to walk home safely, public urination, party crashers and sexual intimidation are among the activities being deemed unacceptable.

"The root of this problem is alcohol," Ferraro said. "And I think if we stay on this trajectory someone is going to die."

Ferraro expressed his sentiments that students have three options in terms of alcohol consumption—abstinence, moderation and drunkenness—the first two being virtuous choices. The third creates problems.

Ferraro also addressed the issue of underage drinking occurring off campus.

"We are in a conservative town in a conservative state and it is illegal to drink if you're under 21," he said. "There are consequences for these actions."

The speech was not limited to discussing the problems, however, Ferraro also addressed potential solutions toward reaching a more controlled off-campus environment.

The suggested solutions were all correlated to parties being held at students' downtown residences. Among these, he argued that houses should have a party list when holding a social function and should turn away individuals who are not on that list.

Along these lines, hosts should also address people attempting to crash their party and ask them to leave. If those individuals will not leave quietly, Ferraro urged students to call the police.

Associate Dean of Students Gerald Commerford said "someone who is hosting the party must stay sober and take charge of the situation."

The deans urged students to think seriously about their actions and the way they are conducting the social scene downtown.

"The better you handle it," Ferraro said, "the less management you get."

Students, meanwhile, indicated that they were very concerned with many aspects of the situation in the borough. In particular, they said they were disturbed by how some situations were being handled by the police. In many cases, students said they felt that they were being unfairly cited for violations.

Former Poet Laureate to visit campus

By Katie Hays

For the first time in the University's history, a former United States Poet Laureate and Consultant in Poetry to the Library of Congress will visit the University. Outwardly, Robert Pinsky brings us his poetry and prestige.

Set to read his poetry 8 p.m. on Oct. 3rd in the Vaughan Literature Auditorium, Pinsky carries with him a fierceness, a passion and a love for life that counteracts the apathy that we so often encounter towards art and the written word.

As the 39th Poet Laureate (his final term ended this past August), Pinsky is not only a writer. He listens to poetry; in his mind, words should dance from the page should be as forceful, alive and resonant within us as music.

A poetry reading by Pinsky will therefore be no plodding affair, no monotonous drone of apathetic, stumbling sound, but a celebration, a symphony, a tribute to the life of words and the flow from the lips.

His love for reading poetry aloud, combined with his talent for writing it and what has been described as his "down to earth, quirky sense of humor" will create a poetry reading that breathes energy into those who hear it.

The precise role of the nation's Poet Laureate and consultant remains open to interpretation, and Pinsky certainly interpreted it to fit his desires; the poet in such a position earns a $35,000 a year stipend, organizes literary programs and readings, and presents lectures.

As Poet Laureate, Pinsky conceived and directed the Favorite Poem Project, an undertaking through which he aimed to create a "collective cultural consciousness" of over 1,200 Americans reading the poetry that enriches their lives.

His end is to show today's American, and to document in history, the place of poetry is not merely along the countless dusty shelves of the Library of Congress,

Multiple sexual assaults raise important questions

Four assaults plague campus; various offices ready to handle all concerns stemming from attacks

By Heather Napolitano

National statistics estimate that one in four women are victims of sexual assault. And, unfortunately many of the incidents contributing to this statistic occur on college campuses.

"[Sexual assault] is happening and the issue is not that we need to accept that, but that students need to take a stance and say that it's not going to happen at Bucknell," Associate Dean of Students and Coordinator for Sexual Assault Protocol Ed Cowell said.

But it does happen at Bucknell. According to Cowell, there have been approximately 16 to 20 reports of sexual assault on campus in the past two years with incidents ranging from unwanted sexual advances—such as touching or groping—to rape.

In such sexual assault cases, general trends in circumstances arise.

"For this crime to occur, there must be a perpetrator, a target and the opportunity, and that opportunity most often occurs when people are isolated in unfamiliar surroundings where they are unable to access help right away," said Janice Butler, director of the Women's Resource Center.

Alcohol also seems to be frequently involved in these cases as it lowers people's ability to assess situations and remove themselves from them if necessary. Alcohol is also a pable of making an individual more aggressive and leading them to coerce someone who they normally would not.

Statistics related to the occurrence of sexual assault at the University are made public on a quarterly basis by Cowell's office to be published in both "Notes and Notices" and in "What's Happening." In those reports, the alleged assault type, the aggrieved party's gender and year, the respondent's gender and year, the location and the action taken for any incident will be divulged.

"I think that Bucknell is very committed to notification of the community in situations like this," said Kari Conrad, assistant dean of students and judicial administrator for sexual assault.

Unfortunately, these releases are demonstrating that the number of sexual assault reports is on the rise. To date this year, four have been filed.

"My own sense is perhaps not that there is more assault, however, but that students are feeling more comfortable reporting it," said Butler. "That to me is a good sign because it means we can get them help and information about their options."

Fujita named new Rabbi

University's first full-time Rabbi looks to expand Hillel

By Rachel Laskow

As the first full-time rabbi on campus, Rabbi Serena Fujita recently became one of the newest members of the University's Jewish community.

Fujita hails from New York and received her bachelor's degree in history and philosophy at Queens College. After college, she spent six months backpacking through Europe and lived on a kibbutz in Israel for six months in 1968. She said, "Living in Israel was frustrating. It was right after the 1967 war. There was a lot of hostility and it was difficult for me to see 17 year olds with rifles and ready to use them. I am a pacifist and it was such a violent environment. There were bombs going off all of the time. It was difficult for me, as an American, to understand the deep-rooted hatred between the Israelis and the Jordanians. I felt like it was being imposed on the people."

Fujita completed her first year of training in Jerusalem with the Reform Movement Seminary and then finished her training at Hebrew Union College/Jewish Institute of Religion in New York City.

Tim Choate—The Bucknellian

Rabbi Serena Fujita hopes to create a larger and more active Jewish community as well as educate Bucknellians about Judaism and Jews.

"Before I started rabbinical training, I thought that I would like to work with university age students," she said.

Last year a search committee was put together to find a rabbi for the University. University Chaplain Reverend Ian Oliver, who was chair of this committee, said, "The University listened to Bucknell's Jewish students, faculty, parents and alumni, who told us that a full-time rabbi was what Bucknell needed in order to serve the Jewish members of our community better."

Hillel Co-Presidents Matthew Kasdan '03 and Risa Salsburg '02 said, "It's great that the school has taken the initiative to provide the Jewish community with their own spiritual leader."

Fujita came to the University in mid-June and began her job as rabbi in July. Fujita said, "The job at Bucknell was as a Jewish chaplain as opposed to a Hillel director, which allows me to do a broader range of activities."

Some of the activities for this year include weekly Shabbat services, celebrating Jewish holidays, movie night and an interfaith Passover Seder.

Hillel is also planning a trip to Washington, D.C. in the fall, a trip to New York City in the spring, and possibly a trip to Israel this spring or next fall.

While on campus, Fujita hopes to create a larger and more active Jewish community as well as educate Bucknell and the greater Lewisburg community about Jews and Judaism.

"There is a uniqueness to being Jewish and I would love to help students express that part of themselves. My goals for Hillel are to get a bigger space, to make Hillel known on campus, and to get people more involved, not necessarily religiously, but as Jews. I also hope to get a larger social community and to involve students in ongoing social justice opportunities," Fujita said.

Oliver said, "She has been open to engaging Bucknell where it is, in order to think about where it might go. She is easy to talk to, and I think she has already formed strong relationships with many students, faculty and staff."

Community to "Stop the Hate"

By Peter Van Emburgh

Over 25 campus and community groups are co-sponsoring the second annual "Stop the Hate" march and vigil, an event demonstrating university and community solidarity against violence motivated by hatred. Starting at 7:00 p.m., the groups will join together in Hufnagle Park on Mon. Oct. 2nd to speak out against hatred based on race, gender, sexual orientation, nationality, religion or disability. Last year's event in downtown Lewisburg drew about 300 people.

"Last year's march was the only time I've ever seen such a diversity of students from Bucknell come together on one issue: Asians, Catholics, Protestants, African-Americans, Jews, Caucasians, Hispanics, gays and lesbians all saying that hatred based on prejudice is unacceptable in our community," said University Chaplain Ian Oliver.

"Our march/vigil seeks to raise people's awareness about the necessity of moving our cultures in every way we can toward the values of compassion and love," said Sandra Morris, associate professor of English and senior fellow for social justice.

Incidents such as the April 28 attack by Richard Scott Baumhammers in suburban Pittsburgh in an Indian grocery store, a Vietnamese restaurant, a Korean business and two synagogues, have led Americans across the country to declare that hate is not welcome in their towns.

One of the more recent acts of hate occurred last week involving the tragic shooting of six gay and lesbian people, one fatally, in Roanoke, VA.

Research demonstrates that such events are a crucial factor in preventing the establishment of hate groups in particular areas. Central Pennsylvania is one of the most active places for hate group activity. The KKK is holding a rally in Carlisle this Saturday and the Aryan Nation is considering relocation to central Pennsylvania in the wake of their recent legal defeat in Idaho. However, Dickinson College is being planned to counter the Klan rally with a Diversity Festival in Carlisle.

"Around the country, we see communities that organize to let the world know that they will do every peaceful thing in their power to oppose hate groups," Oliver said.

These events have heightened the resolve of Lewisburg residents and Bucknellians alike to stand against racism and bigotry. "We're simply saying that this is our home and we want our community to be inclusive, welcoming and hospitable to all people of good will," Oliver said.

The march and vigil, starting in Hufnagle Park, will include speakers from some of the sponsoring groups, and then a candlelight march through downtown Lewisburg. Participants are encouraged to bring flashlights.

Sponsoring groups include: Amnesty International, Beaver Memorial United Methodist Church, BASE, Bucknell Caucus for Economic Justice, Community Alliance for Respect and Equity (CARE), Zumbre, Donald L. Heiter Community Center, FLAG&BT, High School Gay/Straight Alliance, Hillel, Humanities College, International Spectrum, Joseph Preistly Unitarian-Universalist Fellowship, LGBT Awareness Office, LHS CARE Club, LHS Diversity Troupe, Multicultural Center, Muslim Students Association, Race/Gender Resource Center, Rooker Chapel Congregation, St. Andrew's Episcopal Church, St. John's United Church of Christ, Social Justice College, Society of Friends, Students for Asian Awareness at Bucknell, Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition, Union County, Citizen's Committee on Diversity and the University, Chaplain's Office.

Last year's Daily Item Editorial about the march said: "For those who wonder whether we need such demonstrations in our mostly peaceful Valley, there is a clear and definite answer."

It is an answer that peeks out from underneath the attempts by township road crews to cover over hateful graffiti, cowardly scrawled on the roadway outside the home of a bi-racial family.

It is an answer that cried out from the anguish of gay high school and college students who are anonymously but publicly harassed by their peers. It is an answer that is quite simply, yes."

Strategic plan will redefine Greek system

By Laura Day

Emulated and honored by numerous universities, Bucknell's Greek system is one of the most pre-eminent in the nation. With roughly 60 percent of all eligible students participating in the University's Greek system, it is clearly a powerful factor on campus.

Nationwide, Greek systems have been victims of much criticism and negative publicity. However, there are many beneficial attributes of such a tradition, and Bucknell, as it enters the new millennium, is at the forefront of the movement to establish "Prominence in Greek Life."

Within the next few years, the students at Bucknell will see a transformation in the procedures of the Greek system. About a year ago, the Board of Trustees developed the Greek Strategic Planning Initiative as a means of re-evaluating the fraternities and sororities on campus and their impact on student life.

The steering committee that resulted from this initiative came up with a document that defines the responsibilities, guidelines, policies, and expectations of the sororities and fraternities at Bucknell in a contemporary society.

Entitled Bucknell's Plan for Prominence in Greek Life, this lengthy document will be distributed this Friday to selected stakeholder groups for review and feedback. Many of these stakeholder groups (Greek and Non-Greek Students, Faculty, Staff, Trustees, Alumni, Parents, etc.) contributed input that helped form this document.

The final version is scheduled to be proposed to the Trustees in April. Pending approval, Bucknell's Greek system will undergo many improvements to encourage a more positive image of Greek life and demonstrate the advantages of being Greek.

After receiving input from the stakeholder groups, the Committee began to assess the problems that existed and propose remedies. From some groups, there was a general sentiment of disapproval of the Greek system; however, there was also much optimism that our Greek system is constantly improving.

Principally, the Plan for Prominence will address four main concerns. The committee hopes to change the image that the University's Greek system is "all about alcohol," "anti-intellectual," "sexist" and "exclusive."

The Plan bullets approximately 40 initiatives that the fraternities and sororities will undertake. One initiative is the installation of a new system of evaluation. Currently, sororities and fraternities are evaluated on a point system. This method is quite subjective and unrewarding. The new system will be one of "accreditation." Each year the fraternities and sororities on campus are required to complete a variety of assignments, such as community service, mandatory programs, fundraising for philanthropies, alumni interaction, and university involvement, among others. With the new accreditation system, Greek chapters will have a set of minimum requirements, but there will also be the opportunity to be a Silver Star Chapter or a Gold Star Chapter. Clearly, these designations will require more effort, hours, attendance, etc. to complete the standards.

For example, if this plan is approved, it would be required that each chapter completes five mandatory programs during the year, with 75 percent of the chapter at each. There will be a list of approved programs for the chapters to choose from; therefore, they will not be subjected to review at the end of the year. Accreditation is therefore very simple. If a chapter fails to meet this requirement, they do not pass. However, if a chapter exceeds the requirements and attends eight, 10 or more programs, not only will they pass, but they could qualify for Silver or Gold Status, respectively. If a chapter receives a Silver or Gold Status, there will be a series of rewards to accompany it. Suggested rewards for a Gold Star Chapter include: a $1000 gift, university help in financing and billing for dues, and loans for renovations.

Additionally, Gold Star Chapters would be exempt from accreditation for the next two years; Silver Star Chapters would be exempt for one year.

The new system of accreditation provides the chapter with a larger responsibility of choices, but it also gives the Greek System incentive to strive harder and surpass minimum requirements.

Dean Baker, who has been instrumental in the evolution of Bucknell's Greek System, said, "We raised the bar a little bit, but the return is great support from the University." Furthermore, he added that the Plan's initiatives are "ground-breaking" and that other schools are already calling and asking to see the Plan for Prominence.

Another initiative in the plan is reinstating second-semester recruitment. The proposal allows for second-semester freshmen to go through Recruitment as long as they have a 2.5 G.P.A. If their G.P.A. is between 2.0 and 2.5, they can participate in Recruitment if they attend a Study Skills Class.

Other initiatives include the renovation of Hunt Hall and a statement of values that the Greek System should uphold. Five students from each chapter worked together in the spring of 2000 to develop these initiatives.

"I am very proud of my kids," said Dean Baker. "Through this process we have raised everyone's awareness of the Greek System, and the more the different stakeholder groups meet with us, the more they learn." The initiatives stress the importance of working together, encourage taking responsibilities for choices, and emphasize the importance of the Greek System at Bucknell.

Baker concluded that he is thrilled with the progress the Greek System has made in the last few years. "There has been an increased understanding of responsibility on campus, as well as an increase in alumni and university support."

Pending approval in April, Bucknell's Plan for Prominence should further improve our Greek System. The plan states, "The University believes that its reputation as a national leader in undergraduate education demands the same level of excellence from its Greek community, as a model and teacher of the common pillars of scholarship, leadership, character, service, and friendship."

SAE suspended for alleged hazing incident

By Rebecca Rowland

The University, Public Safety and the Lewisburg Police Department are working together to investigate a possible incident of hazing involving the Pennsylvania Zeta chapter of Sigma Alpha Epsilon.

The University has placed the Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity on suspension status.

"We are working with the fraternity and the Lewisburg Police Department on the investigation," Dean of Students Rick Ferraro said. "Thankfully no one was hurt in the alleged incident and everyone is cooperating now."

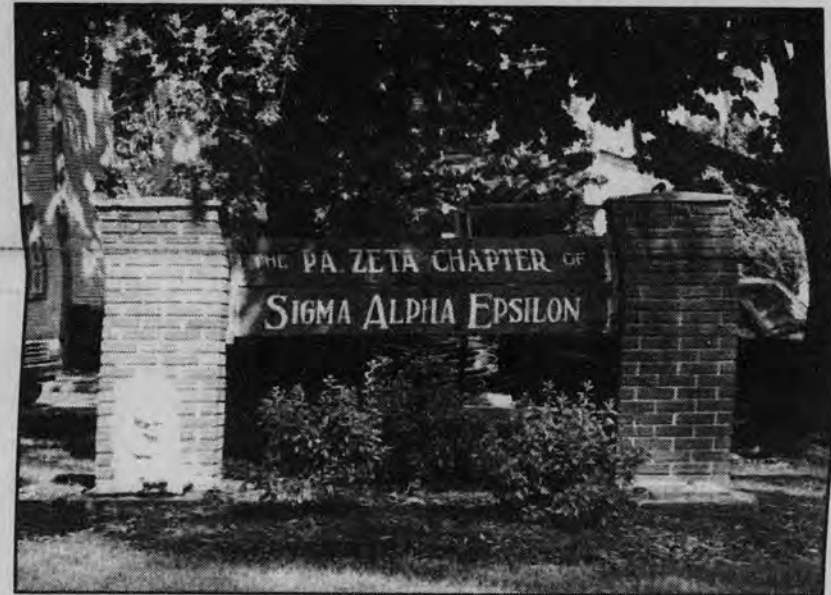

The University's Tau Kappa Epsilon chapter was found guilty also been suspended and the chapter's new member class may not visit the chapter house for any reason or have any contact with the chapter.

Sigma Alpha Epsilon's president John Steipeger '01 could not be reached for comment.

This is the third incident of hazing the University has seen in the last three years. Last fall the University's chapter of Phi Kappa Psi was placed on suspension for suspicion of hazing; an investigation of that incident proved inconclusive and the fraternity was taken off suspension shortly thereafter.

The primary resource on campus for victims of this crime is three sexual assault survivor advocates specifically trained in how to respond to sexual assault disclosures. These women are Director of the Health Promotion Program Tracy Shynak, Associate Director of Admissions Carol Gadd and Writing and Teaching Consultant Deirdre O'Connor.

"Their primary function is to make sure that students who contact them are connected with the multiple options that they have at Bucknell," Conrad said. "They will accompany them as they fulfill any of those options and basically serve as a resource person for that survivor from the time [the assault] happens until they leave campus."

A key concern is placing these students in contact with medical and psychological services such as those available on campus as well as at other locations such as Evangelical Community Hospital and Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition.

"Our philosophy is one of empowerment," Butler said. "We give them the information, but the decision remains with the individual as to what they want to do."

In terms of legal adjudication, victims essentially have three options. The first is to take no action at all. The second is to file external charges, which generally requires the individual to file a police report and meet with the District Attorney. The third is to take action within the University.

Each year, the number of charges within the University's system can range from two to a dozen.

Within this system, there are three different options. Mediation is not a form of adjudication but simply the opportunity for the aggrieved party to have disclosure with the respondent. Binding arbitration is a form of hearing that is decided by one individual as opposed to a board. Finally, the hearing board on sexual assault tries cases and the decision is made by a group of five individuals—2 faculty, 2 students and an administrator.

Decisions made in the internal system are based upon a preponderance of evidence, which is essentially determining whether the crime was more likely to have occurred than not based on the evidence presented. If the respondent is found guilty, the board is free to impose any sanction outlined in the student handbook, the worst being separation from the University.

"It is very important that these cases are adjudicated as fairly and as properly as we can," Conrad said. "Bucknell is absolutely committed to that."

In order to familiarize students with the process of adjudication, there will be a mock rape hearing tonight at 6 p.m. in the LC forum that will outline an alleged rape and how the board reaches a decision.

The University is attempting to heighten awareness of sexual assault through a number of other means as well. At lunchtime today, as well as tomorrow afternoon, workshops are being held for faculty and staff members on how to handle disclosures so that they will be aware of the options and resources.

The Women's Resource Center is also trying to get a men's program relating to sexual assault off the ground. In this forum, men will speak with other men about issues related to gender and relationships.

"It's very important that men are involved in this and see it not as a women's issue but as a community issue," Butler said.

Butler is also working towards the formation of a support group for victims of sexual assault. This group will assemble beginning Oct. 16.

The overall aim of the efforts coordinated by the Women's Resource Center is not only to provide aid for those who fall victim to it, but to raise University awareness and, hopefully prevent it from occurring in the future.

"I believe that because people think that this is a sleepy, little, country town nothing can happen here," Butler said. "But unfortunately crime can happen anywhere."

Health Center to give AIDS test

By Ryan Delahanty

The Ziegler Health Center will be conducting AIDS tests at 3 p.m. on Oct. 2, at noon on Nov. 6 and at 3:00 p.m. Nov. 27. All tests offered are by appointment only. The University receives state funding and state nurses come to administer the test in order to ensure confidentiality.

Across college campuses one in 250 students has been diagnosed as being HIV positive. In the past, Bucknell students have tested positive for the virus and those people have been treated "aggressively" at Geisinger Hospital.

The administration, through the Health Center, has taken many steps to prevent the spread of sexually transmitted diseases such as giving out pamphlets throughout campus, having informative workshops that promote sexual awareness, providing free testing, and giving out free condoms.

"We have given out about 20,000 condoms a year," said Dr. Don Stechschulte, director of student health services. "The main risk factor for contracting an STD, more specifically the HIV virus, is having unprotected sex."

"Theoretically, AIDS is a totally preventable infection," Dr. Stechschulte said. "We control whether or not we allow the virus into our body, usually."

"Approximately 33 percent of college students say the last time they had sex it was unprotected," Stechschulte continued. "That's an alarming number considering the fact it only takes one time to contract the virus. Students are putting themselves at great risk."

Often there is the question of what "type" of person should get an HIV test? The most likely candidates include: those who have sex while using other drugs such as alcohol or marijuana; those who have a sexually transmitted disease such as syphilis, gonorrhea, herpes, or history of an STD; those who have had unprotected sexual contact with any person or persons; those who are survivors of sexual assault.

The test is being offered so that students have the opportunity to find out whether or not they have contracted an STD. Many students feel that this is an impossibility but Dr. Stechschulte disagrees.

"The HIV virus is a real issue that has to be dealt with," Stechschulte said. "AIDS is real. Many people here don't believe that it can happen to them but those are the people who are at greatest risk, because they choose to be unaware of the possibility of their contracting an STD."

The Ziegler Health Center has been doing the HIV/AIDS test for nine years. On average, 15-20 students take advantage of the free testing that Bucknell offers. New developments in testing format have been developed in the past few years, which allow for a sample of saliva to be taken, rather than having to draw blood.

The government is trying to take out factors, like drawing blood, which might scare people away from taking the test. It usually takes antibodies to the HIV virus 6 to 8 weeks to grow so it is recommended that you take the test again at 3, 6, 9 and 12-month intervals.

It seems as though not enough students on campuses are being tested. Nearly 60 to 70 percent of all college sexual encounters occur when either one or both parties are drunk. Alcohol-related sex is a higher risk than sober sex and people that already have other STD's are in a higher risk group category.

"Once penetration has been achieved, it is technically sex and that is when these viruses can be passed to each partner," Stechschulte said. "The tests are free and anonymous, more people should come."

In treating people infected with the HIV virus, doctors use what is called a "cocktail approach." This basically means that multiple drugs will be used, that are time dependent and lately this method has become a sub-specialty in and of itself.

While this has been very successful at times, there are still alarming numbers that remind us that people are not practicing safe sex.

Consider that 70 percent of adults have been exposed to the genital warts virus. This doesn't necessarily mean that they will show any symptoms, just that they are infected.

A few cases of genital herpes have been treated on campus, but unfortunately there isn't a cure yet. This virus compromises the woman's ability to conceive and deliver children. Her social interactions will be inexorably altered.

"I have zero tolerance for unprotected sex," Stechschulte said. "If people don't practice safe sex, then there is a much greater possibility of their catching a sexually transmitted disease."

"Even if one person has an STD, that's one person too many."

"We have received, for the first time since the cap policy was implemented, a number of applications exceeding the cap of 160," Rowe said.

"However, the office of international education has received approval to approve more students than the cap allows, in order to compensate for the increased size of the class of '02."

"We are still working their way through application files, but we will not reject any eligible junior because of the cap. We will, as we always do, go strictly by eligibility rather than a prescribed quota."

The quota, or cap, placed on the number of students is a recent addition to the University's study-abroad approval policies.

"We implemented the cap on programs not sponsored by the University, meaning programs beyond the Bucknell in London, France, or Barbados programs, and the Bucknell-Northingham Exchange in Engineering program, after the numbers drastically shifted to the spring semester, creating a great difference in our fall vs. spring enrollment figures. This put a strain on the University's ability to manage enrollment and hence the budget," said Rowe.

Bucknell encourages abroad study because it aids students in conquering ethnocentrism; it removes them from their comfort zone and allows them to encounter new modes of thought. However, many students do not choose to study abroad for such reasons.

"The shift to more students studying in the spring came when rush changed from second semester sophomore year to first semester sophomore year," said Rowe. "Many junior students in fraternities and sororities prefer to stay on campus in the fall for rush and then travel in the spring. In addition, the weather is often warmer and students can use the following summer for travel."

Under the cap, students who choose the spring semester less for academic reasons and more for on-campus social schedules will still have opportunities for spring approval, but students whose academic schedules require them to study abroad spring semester will receive preference.

If the number of applications exceeds the cap of 160, the office will use the following ranked guidelines for approval of eligible

and spring semesters need to be more balanced for better enrollment and budgetary planning. If between fall semester and the next spring we have a dramatic increase of students studying abroad, beyond what we were expecting, it puts serious restraints on the University's budget and on our ability to admit more freshmen as we could have if more juniors had studied abroad fall semester. The university's budget is to be balanced so as to better serve the students who are on-campus."

Therefore, according to Rowe, "We encourage students to study abroad in the fall semester if possible. The students would benefit from the study abroad in the fall semester just as they would in the spring. If a student has academic reasons for studying abroad the spring semester, that student will get priority."

Essentially, the office wants to allow all eligible students the academic and cultural experience of study abroad.

Despite the overwhelming number of applicants for spring semester, the office of international education has yet to actually impose its spring quota; rather, they continue to search for the best means of providing students with educational abroad studies that will, besides suiting student social schedules, foster intellectual development.

Paige Cull—The Bucknellian

Barbara Rowe, director of International Education, said that the office has received approval to approve more students than the cap allows at 160. Students who are required to study abroad in the spring will gain preference.

applications:

1. The student's academic justification. (For example, a student might need to remain on campus fall semester in order to student teach. This student's approval for abroad-study is more likely than one for someone who has no academic reasons at all for spring semester abroad study.)
2. The student's participation in programs taught exclusively in a foreign language or in a non-traditional destination.
3. All else being equal, the students with the highest grade point average, demonstrating academic motivation, will win him/her preference.

These guidelines, listed on an information sheet available in the international education office, conclude, "Even if student applicants meet the above criteria, there is no guarantee that all eligible students will be approved. Student applicants who do meet criteria but who are denied preliminary approval for spring semester may appeal to the Committee on International Education whose decision is final."

This list, however, focuses upon academics and does not necessarily accommodate student above); Rowe says that this is currently under review.

Why does such a cap need to exist? Why not approve all students, regardless of their reasoning for choosing spring semester, to study abroad?

Answered Rowe, "The fall

One down, more to go

Tuesday evening's discussion between Dean of Students Rick Ferraro and University students currently living off-campus is being deemed the first in a series of necessary steps to relieve the conflicts occurring in the borough.

And due to the willingness to openly discuss the issues demonstrated by both parties in attendance, perhaps this first step will yield positive results. Ferraro entered into this discussion with the evident intention to create solutions by raising students' awareness of off-campus living that require attention. He further offered suggestions as to how students should address these issues.

Ferraro's discussion provided insight into the administration's position on recent events surrounding this situation, which created a new perspective for students.

Similarly, students seized the opportunity to voice their concerns and grievances with how this conflict has been unfolding, bringing administrator's attention to the aspects that they find to be of utmost importance.

The conclusion that can be drawn from this interchange is that there is no simple solution to the off-campus problem. The most effective means of reducing the current strain is communication and we applaud the University for recognizing this.

But the fact remains that this meeting, alone, cannot create solutions. The problems occurring off-campus extend far beyond the University students inhabiting the borough.

The first constituents that need to engage in a similar discussion with the students are the Lewisburg residents who live on Sixth, Seventh and St. Catherine streets. This would provide the opportunity for both parties to express their perspective on residing in their shared community and potentially relieve the tension due to an enhanced understanding of the other's situation.

Students attending Tuesday's meeting also expressed an interest in meeting with Lewisburg Police Chief William Neltz and members of the force. While this confrontation holds the most potential for dispute between the parties, it could be highly constructive if both students and the police calmly enter into the discussion with the intent to create solutions.

Students also indicated their belief that administration need to hold a similar meeting to discuss off-campus issues with first-year students, which is an extremely valid suggestion. Freshmen are contributing greatly to the traffic on the Lewisburg sidewalks and the overcrowding of off-campus parties while other options such as Uptown are suffering from poor attendance. Holding a discussion for first-year students to reiterate their social options could alleviate many of these problems.

The bottom line is that this complex problem can be solved if, and only if, all involved parties are called into discussions similar to the one that took place on Tuesday evening. Though this may have been a seemingly positive step, it remains just that: a step. We hope that the University will continue to intervene and call others forth to express themselves in the effort to put this issue to rest.

Aaron Spelling brings trashy "Titans" to NBC Wednesday nights

By Rebecca Rowland

Next Wednesday marks the return of something that for one have been missing terribly—a trashy Aaron Spelling show.

Ever since "Beverly Hills 90210" and "Melrose Place" were taken off the air there has been a certain something (I think smut is the word I am groping for) missing from evening television. Sure there are reruns but Kelly's struggle with her mother's remarriage pales in comparison to her struggle with getting shot, raped, burned, pregnant, miscarrying and joining a cult (not necessarily in that order).

But don't despair, "Titans" (on NBC) is here! Led by Yasmine Bleeth and Victoria Principal (how could this show not be cheesy?), "Titans" promises to be worthy of the name Aaron Spelling.

Although the show is not set to air until next Wednesday, the commercials already have me psyched beyond belief. There will be wife-stealing, sister backstabbing each other, bed-hopping, husband stealing—a whole slew o' plots bawdy enough to make Heidi Fleiss blush.

I think this show will be strong enough to blow the other Wednesday night favorite, "Dawson's Creek" right out of the well, creek. Now instead of watching Dawson whine about existential crises involving tenth grade homework, you can watch Yasmine Bleeth top the bitch charts in four-inch stilettos. After all, Yasmine does have a killer smut resume.

Hailing from "Baywatch" she has already proven that she can run on a beach in slow motion, wear a bathing suit to every occasion and somehow not look out of place, rescue surfers who can't read the shark warning signs because they are illiterate (remember that one? It was a classic) and bring realism and focus to her roles. Right.

"Titans" will take place in California (so Yasmine won't get confused), Aaron Spelling's favorite smut location. There is something about palm trees and freeways that turn even the most provincial person into a raging slut. All it took was one apartment on Melrose to turn Courtney Thorne-Smith from a doe-eyed mid-wester into a sex-pet.

There have been other shows that were very similar (dare I say rip-offs?) to these Spelling classics that just didn't cut it. Remember Savannah? I actually liked this one a lot—picture Melrose with southern accents; "You shot mah daddy!" "Fiddle-dee-dee, Ah did nothin' of the kahnd!" I am honestly still wondering why this show was cancelled.

What about Central Park West? New York just wasn't a good locale for this kind of show; Woody Allen had already defined the quintessential New Yorker and they were more neurotic than any of Spelling's plots allow for. "You shot my father!" "No I didn't, he lives in Queens, you think I am going to pay the toll and put up with the traffic!" "OK, let's go get some coffee."

"Titans", however, has all the makings of a classic. The "Dallas" for the new millennium, who shot J.R.? Who cares! Titans is on and this week Yasmine and Victoria get into a cat fight over Enrique, the hot houseboy. See you on the couch!

Should there be a cap on the number of students allowed to study abroad?

Yes

No

By Brian Watson

Rumors travel fast—especially on this campus.

The latest ridiculous, blown-out-of-proportion gossip involves studying abroad. Anxious juniors ran around last week vexing about getting approved for off-campus study, worrying about their chances against 400 other applicants.

The current cap of students permitted to study in non-University programs would keep almost 250 of these applicants on campus next spring. The rumor mill struck again—there weren't really 400 applicants, but there were enough to approach the cap.

The Office of International Education has said they won't be using the cap, but they will only accept students who meet the necessary application requirements.

But what if there were 400 students looking to study abroad? If the University let everyone go, it would lose millions of dollars in revenue. That's why capping the number of students who study abroad is reasonable.

The cap of 160 students allowed to study abroad in the spring semester was put in place in fall 1997 to help the University ensure that it receives adequate revenue from appropriate areas to maintain a period of physical and financial growth. A 1997 joint report completed by the Committee on Instruction and the Committee for Planning and Budget estimated revenue shortages estimated between $600 thousand and one million dollars.

The remedy: put a limit on how many students could leave campus or make up for the loss with 30 extra full time equivalent (FTE) students and a freshman class of 925.

These numbers may have changed, but the principle remains. Initiating a cap clearly was the more feasible option.

The fact that students are forced to pay University tuition is another point—and probably a more arguable one. Many non-University programs cost significantly less than University dues, so students are often forced to pay extra to go abroad. If your program costs $9,500, you still have to pay much more. The University decided on this policy after examining other schools and their approaches to alleviating financial burden from losing students to overseas programs.

The Office of International Education works diligently to help students plan their semesters abroad and provide immeasurable advice to interested students; it's not their job to deter students from going away. The office does a phenomenal job in making sure students are prepared to go away and will have a easy transition upon return.

The University made a cautious, logical choice by placing a limit on student access to study abroad programs. By adding the payment stipulation to the policy change, the University may have gone a step too far.

By Rebecca Rowland

160. It is the magic number, the number that rules the lives of juniors this semester. Will I go abroad? Will I get rejected? How many people can go again?

The abroad office has a cap set on the number of students that can study off-campus during the spring semester. That number has historically been around 160. Since there are several more hundred juniors than 160, it suffices to say that there is the very real possibility that some students will have their applications denied.

That, quite simply, is not fair.

Have you ever thought about why the University does not want scores of students to leave? It is because they would lose valuable tuition money. You are just a dollar sign to this school. The value of studying abroad has been hyped up beyond belief—it is the best time of your life! the things you learn stay with you your whole life!—so how is it the University's prerogative to deny you the right to go?

I find it absolutely ridiculous that it is anyone's business but the foreign school you are applying to and your own as to whether or not you are able to study abroad. Do you have the grades? Can you afford it? Those are the only issues that should be taken into consideration, not whether or not too many of your classmates are also going to go abroad so, in order to retain some tuition money, the school is going to tell some of you that you can't.

As anyone who is familiar with the abroad application procedure will tell you, you still have to pay Bucknell tuition for the semester that you are abroad. The only money the University loses is room, board, books and the money you spend to do your laundry.

So what is the problem? At what point does the value of the education you receive here become more important than how much money you spend here?

Realistically speaking, not that many students do decide to study in a foreign country. If there were no cap the entire junior class would not be abroad at the same time, the number is not that big of an issue. Students are not asking that the school accept the loss of 880 people's tuition; the issue of whether or not students who go abroad should have to pay tuition at all is another thorny one, but one that the students are willing to let slide. All they want is to be able to study abroad if they have the desire and the capability.

The University should be your ally; it should help you achieve your academic goals as interestingly and willingly as possible. The idea that the abroad office is there, not to make sure you go to study abroad if you want to, but to essentially work to prevent people from getting is a depressing thought.

The cap has been adjusted to accommodate the size of the junior class but the whole idea of limiting who can go by any other criterion than grades is ludicrous.

Students prefer to run across the street at will, rather than use the poorly placed crosswalks. And no one on campus has any concept of time whatsoever.

I don't know about you, but I have done everything in my power to avoid 8 a.m. classes since I had one freshman year. My classes start at 9, still a bit early, but I can sleep until at least 8... or so I thought.

But every morning at about 7:15 or some other ungodly hour, some ridiculous racket starts outside my window: construction guys screaming, a garbage truck rolling by and, from what I can tell, repeatedly backing into a dumpster or someone mowing the lawn even though a.) It's way too cold for grass to grow and b.) It's raining.

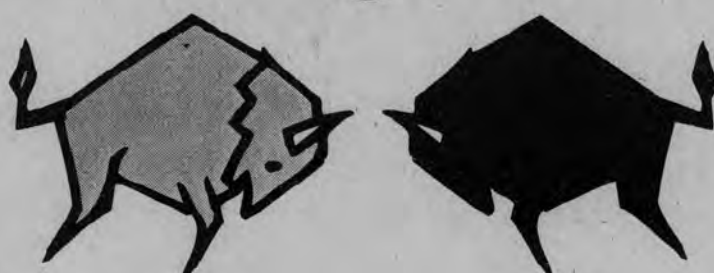

Is there some reason these tasks couldn't be held off until at least half the campus is awake?

Then there's class, exactly 52 minutes of it. At least, that's what my schedule says. However, some professors are under the impression that those eight minutes we have between classes are actually extra time in which they can spew out five pages worth of notes, even though you already put your notebook away in hopes that they will get the hint that class is over.

There are those beloved members of our community that are just a bit too picky about time. There's nothing I love more than waking up to move my car out of faculty parking at the crack of dawn and finding a fresh ticket on my windshield because it is exactly 8:01 a.m.

It is rivaled only by the thrill of Public Safety, stop stalking me

By Maureen Fick

By the very nature of humanity, everyone has one thing that gives him or her problems more often than anything else does. Some people are plagued by computer hard drives that seem to eat files and some suffer from physical ailments (chronic joint pain for example) that hinder their activities. I have horrible luck with cars.

Now don't get me wrong, I love to drive. I, like all new drivers, counted down to my 16th birthday and relished the feeling of independence as I left the house alone, my destination outside the radius considered "walking distance." Well, please hand me back my walking shoes.

I am absolutely convinced, after only four weeks of the semester, that my little, (and formerly inconspicuous) black Jetta has some text scrawled across the sides that only disciplinary officials can see. As to the message in this text, we can all take guesses. I prefer to think it must be something like, "I have money to burn... ticket me!" Or maybe it's more taunting. "You know you've always hated these cars. Now's your chance to really get 'em."

Whatever it is, though, it is costing me big time and, for the first time since I started driving, it is not entirely my fault.

Now I don't have the cleanest driving record but before this year I had never gotten in any trouble per se. I have had my share of run-ins with inanimate objects, on separate occasions of course, and caused enough damage that my family and friends have enjoyed running jokes at my expense. But for the past couple years I have been spotless, a model driver all the way around. Until now.

I started with a campus parking violation for "backing" into a free-standing parking space, allowing Public Safety to view my green student sticker from either end of my car. And since he would have to circle the car anyway to reach the other cars in the lot, it hardly seemed like a $25 inconvenience was necessary. So out went a letter of appeal, confidently pleading my innocence.

Well, then came Parents' Weekend. Having made plans to drive home, I left school after my last class on Friday and sailed down 11/15 on one of the sunniest, most uplifting afternoons in recent memory. It was so sunny, I almost didn't see the red and blue lights racing up the left-hand lane after me, not 20 minutes after I had turned out of Bucknell's entrance.

I had never been pulled over and somehow managed to provide my license and registration upon demand. When I explained that I didn't know what I was doing since this was my first experience with a cop actually climbing through my window, I figured he would feel sorry for me (a lone, shaken, defenseless female) and give me a warning. Oh no. After spending an eternity in his patrol car and then coming back to my window to deliver yet another bout of terrifying intimidation, he left in his wake a bright yellow citation and me, now borderline hysterical at the prospect of losing $149.50 immediately following the already costly Big/Little week.

Luckily, I have wonderful understanding parents and my dad and I wrote the letter requesting a court date over the weekend.

I returned to campus in time for my first class Monday morning, pulling my car up to the door in the Trax lot to unload my trunk up four flights of stairs to my room. As is customary here, I put on my flashers and began the haul to my room, heavily laden with laundry. On my second trip, I closed the trunk in an attempt to conserve battery power since the inflated tire rattles and other electrical abuses through these figures into question, as well as the assertion by the opposition parties that Kostunica received 55 percent of votes, compared to Milosevic's 35 percent.

Other discrepancies emerged as state television claimed that only 64 percent of citizens voted, while those opposition parties cited a figure of 74 percent.

Milosevic possessed several courses of action once he was informed that he was losing the election: delay the final result by stopping the tallying of votes, force a runoff election by committing a small amount of voter fraud, disregard the election and call for a new one or simply declare victory by claiming over a million phantom votes.

The only action that would not cause immediate massive unrest and nationwide protests was to commit a little voter fraud and force a second round of elections. Milosevic's reasoning has always been the same—"a little corruption never hurt anyone."

However, thousands of his people are rallying in the streets of Belgrade, demanding his ousting, which will lift the sanctions by the United States and promote democratic change.

Unfortunately, for Milosevic, the Yugoslav people already know how he plays the political game—through lies and force. Opposition economist Mladjan Djindjic warned a crowd of 50,000 in the Republic Square in Belgrade, "Don't be surprised if someone tries to obstruct our attempt to have a better life."

However, the president of the Yugoslav United Left Party, Ljubisa Ristic, said, "The will of the people will be respected," but this comment is clouded in suspicion when one considers that this is the party of Milosevic's wife, Mirjana Markovic.

The scenario of Milosevic victorious after a second round of elections will undoubtedly cause demonstrations and violence yet unseen in Yugoslavia. When the voice of a nation is ignored, the glass castle in which the elite and powerful live will shatter. Military force can only contain the dissent for a certain amount of time before that too is overcome.

History tells numerous stories of powerful dynasties—the Bourbons, for instance—falling because of the refusal to abide by the people's demands, despite the resources at their disposal.

Milosevic is only one man and surely the Yugoslav people, with the support of other countries, can end his rule and, in turn, herald the birth of democracy. As Mr. Kostunica declared, "Dawn is coming to Serbia."

Pocono establishment offers rush for students who wish to get up in clouds

By Katie Hays

With the advent of the Skydiving Club last year, Bucknellians have, with increasing frequency, made the hour's drive to Sugarloaf, Pennsylvania to Above the Poconos Skydivers, either for a first-time tandem skydive or a tenth, eleventh, or fiftieth freefall.

The establishment's chief tandem instructor, Don Kellner, is the Guinness Book of World Records holder for most skydives in a lifetime (29,000 skydives).

The establishment has had experience in skydiving instruction, exhibitions, freefall photography, and government-certified parachute rigging since 1961. They are members of the United States Parachute Association and all instructors are licensed and certified by the Association.

I didn't initially intend to fall 10,000 feet from the sky; it was simply the logical end to a procession of mistakes that I can trace with little effort. One of my hallmates, upon returning from his first skydive with Brad Carpenter's Skydiving Club, gave me the number for Above the Poconos Skydivers. I carelessly scrawled the number, 888-654-PLAY, on a sheet of paper next to the phone number for a Broadway company that I would be contacting for play tickets.

This constitutes my first mistake. The second mistake sprang from the first. When attempting to call the Broadway show company, I dialed the "PLAY" number. "Hello, skydiving!" a voice answered.

I never occurred to me to hang up the phone. The connection remained silent for a moment as I mentally identified my error and solved it with a college student's superior reasoning skills: I would simply pretend that I had meant to call this number. I would skydive.

Thus the second mistake had given birth to a third, and before I had fully considered the consequences of my reserving a skydiving slot, a week passed.

I sat nervously inside of a small building at the Hazelton Airport, signing away my life.

Legal-jargon and warnings snarled from the pages in front of me as, overhead, a video played; a serious lawyer on the screen delivered, in monotone, "Please read the last paragraph aloud with me. I AM FULLY RESPONSIBLE!"

Staring at the video lawyer, I bit my lip and asked the receptionist politely, "You have a one hundred percent success rate?"

I do not remember much of the five-minute training period, but retain a few fragmented images of myself lying ing on the floor in strange contorted positions that I would theoretically be able to imitate while falling from a plane. After training, I don a black jumpsuit and cap, and follow Darlene Kellner, the woman who will film the event and her husband, Don, to whom I will strap in a "tandem" skydive.

We squeeze comfortably into a small space between floor and ceiling as the plane-engine hums to life, the scenery of the airport blurs, and the ground suddenly drops out beneath us. The earth shrinks and the cars turn to Micro-Machines, the roads to grids.

When the plane roars at about 4,000 feet above earth, I consider how much more dangerous this will be than jumping from my lofted bed each morning. The plane's door opens and a man, with a rushing "thup" of air, disappears out into the silence beyond the plane.

Don jokes, "Whoops! Lost one," and the plane rises higher.

That which lies beyond the window is tiny now; cities are as big as a door!" The dipping hum of the plane, the shift of my knees, and Don's snapping the hooks of my jumpsuit to his, making us one person, blur into a single event.

The door opens to a whirling gust of air that dries the mouth, and I find to my amazement that my knees will slide to a 90 degree angle so that they're half out of the plane and I am staring at a circular horizon, above the clouds, the blueness of sky. I gasp. And then the tiny plane tilts, the door yawns widely and coughs us out.

The hum of plane is gone; I forget Don strapped to my back. There is no me, no people, no past, no future, but only now, this blue and the tiny intricate grid towards which I am seem to be rushing. It's no thrill ride, but pure bliss, a rush of wind at my ears and the entire world new perspective as we approach it and I recognize people as we float lightly and touch ground. We land standing.

We are alive. Don yells to Darlene, "See, she did great! I knew she would." He does not mention knees or legs. I thank him for his patience.

"Even after setting the world record for most jumps, I can't describe it," Don says. I agree with him; something in the dive eludes words. No, I didn't initially intend to fall 10,000 feet from the sky, but who does? Is not all of living simply a bizarre procession of mistakes that perhaps are not mistakes, a chain of circumstances that we can only trace in gods of glide for thirty seconds.

thumb, and rivers are just tiny ribbons. We reach 10,000 feet, it is time to go and I must assume some semblance of the "correct" position. Without warning, Don and Darlene begin to speak a garbled foreign language that I can only half-follow. For example, they use words like "knees."

What are "knees" when you are in a space as long as your extended body and as wide as three friends sitting side-by-side, 10,000 feet in the air above Sugarloaf, Pennsylvania?

"This is the real thing!" Darlene cries, "You have to move your knees and strap to Don before we open the establishment, and the Lilac Moon serves quite a few excellent dishes. Begin with their array of unique salads. In particular, the House Salad with either the House

The interior of the Lilac Moon Café offers an escape from the usual.

Dressing or the Honey Glazed dressing is a great choice. Most other places do not go to salads in order to concentrate on the main dishes. The Lilac Moon easily offers the best salads in town. Fresh lettuce, tomatoes, celery, carrots, radishes, are all included, crisp and delicious.

After the salad, the Specials for the Day come highly recommended. The actual menu is rather limited, but features high-quality entrees.

Customers can choose between 10 different entrees, sandwiches, and wraps. The café also selects eight specials for the day. One such entree was the shrimp salad ($8.95). The tomato and mozzarella salad ($7.95) is another favorite. Those in favor of larger entrees should try the house specialties, mainly the lasagna dish ($7.95). Although described as having light cheese, the lasagna is actually very soft with lots of cheese, and is a great dish for pasta lovers. Choose the tasty ham and cheese wrap ($8.95) for another excellent meal.

The food at the Lilac Café provides a diversion and contrast from the food available on campus. A lazy Saturday afternoon or early Friday lunch would be the perfect time to dine. Bring along your friends as the café provides a quiet place to chat without interruptions or distractions. The Lilac Moon café is definitely a unique opportunity that students should not miss.

retrospect? And is not all of living a series of perspective-changes, and, once in a while, some epiphany, some indescribable peace, some joy?

I did not learn this in the sky, but

Wink Thinks

Dear Wink,

Do you ever see something that you just have to have? Well, I hope you can understand my situation, because I see things that I have to have all the time since coming to Bucknell. I don't know if there is something wrong with me, but whether it's a guy or a pair of shoes it has to be mine, and I won't take no for an answer. I hope that my parents didn't raise me wrong. Shouldn't people usually get what they want?

I have seen this guy around campus lately, we have talked a few times, and like most things, I want to have him.

He just looks so warm and cuddly, and is just so neat! However, I don't know if he is interested in me. When I talk to him he kind of seems turned off, for what reason I don't know. Do you think it could be me, or maybe he just my breath? I am really scared to tell him the truth because I think it might be me that is the problem. For some reason, I am just not getting what I want this time and it is simply driving me crazy.

So Wink, with that info, I ask you, is it me, or is this boy just not all there? Additionally, is there something that you can think of for me to do in order to draw this boy in with my charms? Sincerely, Girl Who Gets Things

Dear Girl Who Gets Things,

Let me start off by saying that I don't think that you get it. Yes, that's right, you aren't going to get it this time! Not only will you probably not get what I am writing to you, for reasons beyond my control, but you are also probably not going to get this guy as well. For some reason, I don't think that it is your breath. Let me clue you into something about guys because I happen to be one. Don't come up to us thinking that you can just have us, because you can't, unless of course the guy is really desperate. That being said, understand the fact that you won't get anyone if you walk around with a virtual leash and collar thinking, "I'll take that one!" I don't think so! So now that you have a greater sense of what not to do let me clue you into why this guy may in fact be turned off.

You must understand that you cannot come over as pushy. It sounds like to me that you think of this guy as some kind of stuffed animal rather than a person. Who calls people "warm and cuddly"? The only person who calls something neat is my grandma, and even then I don't know what it means. So let me answer your question as simply as I can. Yes, you turn him off. You probably will just have to come to terms with the fact that he is not interested, and therefore, you can't have him. I know this is probably very distressing to you, but it is only normal that people don't get what they want all the time, especially when what they want is another living person.

If you really wanted to get this guy, the only way I can think of you being able to do so is to change your persona. He probably just doesn't like you for some reason or another. However, nobody should have to change themselves to get someone, it just isn't realistic. There is no reason that somebody is worth having to change who you are. Though he may not be interested, I am sure there are a ton of people out there who would be willing to be branded with your name. So I would suggest to you that you just leave this guy alone, or else he may end up telling you to get a life.

To sum it up, don't think that you can have us. You have to earn us. That in fact goes for most things in life.

While Pinsky attended to both his laureate and consultant positions, he also retained his sense of humor. When asked which of his jobs he preferred, he replied, "It's a greater distinction to be consulted than to be lauded."

An Abroad Perspective: A semester in Florence, Italy

By Heather Napolitano

It didn't seem to be reality until I sat uncomfortably on a Rome bound flight between two animated Italian women. For the better part of nine hours, the two engaged each other in enthusiastic conversation spoken in their native language, which they occasionally directed at myself. Unable to understand, questioning why I had never taken an Italian course, it struck me that my semester abroad in Florence was beginning.

Fortunately, the language barrier would become less of an obstacle than I anticipated.

My program placed me with a large Italian host family consisting of two parents, two 20-year-old daughters, a grandmother and a slew of other relatives who made regular visits to the apartment. To my relief, the entire family spoke sufficient English, as I later discovered a majority of city dwelling Italians do.

This family extended an enthusiastic welcome to both my American roommate and myself, actively involving us in their daily lives. This meant that we sat down with them nearly every night for a one to two hour family dinner that was more of an event than a meal. As one might expect, pasta was generally one of the multiple courses. The food lived up to all expectations though they tended to be overly enthusiastic with their use of olive oil.

Our host mother treated us as difficult adjustment considering that our culture values more personal space.

Fortunately, three-day weekends of travelling provided the breaks necessary to maintain sanity. These trips were undoubtedly the highlight of my abroad experience.

For the first several months of she would her own children, which meant she concerned herself with every aspect of our lives and would rarely allow an hour to pass when we were in the apartment without monitoring our activity. This was a the program, friends and I primarily visited cities in Italy. In Rome, I stood with thousands of people in St. Peter's square while Pope John Paul II stood at his window and blessed the crowd. In Naples, I ate in a shady restaurant that boasted the creation of the pizza. In Venice, I rode through the canals in a gondola while the world-renowned Carnival celebration took place in the squares.

As the semester unfolded, we began to travel outside of the country. I had the opportunity to visit the French Riviera and sit on the beaches of Nice and Cannes. One weekend, I was particularly ambitious and flew to Dublin, Ireland, and spent three days sight-seeing and visiting pubs. Spring break brought a week of travelling through Spain with activities including a performance by flamenco dancers.

The few weekends that I did not travel and remained in Florence were no less enriching. The city itself is old, but beautiful. Its trademarks being the burnt-orange tile roofs, the massive cathedral in the central district and the tremendous amount of artwork and culture it hosts despite its size.

I did the typical tourist activities, of course, visiting museums filled with artwork by Renaissance greats such as Michelangelo, Raphael, DaVinci and Donatello. But since this was my home for four months, I was also able to experience things that would generally be missed by someone passing through. I attended a soccer game between Florence and a rival city one Saturday afternoon, which was a cultural experience as Italians are very fortunate, not shy. One night I was serenaded by a 30-year-old Italian man who followed me around for 10 minutes singing "Sex Bomb" and whistling, which was a common occurrence for any Amer-passionate about the sport. I was also fortunate enough to acquire tickets to a performance of the opera "La Traviata," attended by the Princess of Monaco and Sophia Loren.

Nightlife was also a major component of life in Florence as the city has countless bars, clubs and "discotheques." At these venues, the Italian men lived up to all of my preconceived notions. They love American girls and are, unican girl.

But this was all part of the Italian experience—one that I would not alter in any way. Adapting to a culture so different from our own provides the ultimate challenge of a semester abroad, but also the ultimate rewards. And so, after spending four months exploring all aspects of life in Italy, I left with a broadened perspective, an enhanced range of personal experiences and, of course, a bigger waistline.

but within the mind and heart of the average American.

"It isn't so much the people and it isn't so much the poems," said Pinsky in a 1998 New York Times interview. "It's the relationship between the person and the poem, the attachment, that makes it interesting."

In another interview within the year, Pinsky advocated poetry reading because "anyone who says a poem aloud has the experience of becoming, physically, the medium for Emily Dickinson or Wordsworth or whoever wrote the poem" (American Poetry, Winter 1997-98).

While Pinsky attended to both his laureate and consultant positions, he also retained his sense of humor. When asked which of his jobs he preferred, he replied, "It's a greater distinction to be consulted than to be lauded."

Falling back into seriousness, he said, "The Poet Laureate's job is, I suppose, more like teaching than writing. Like teaching, it's a public job, a task located between you and other people. So the position is not much like writing in that sense. It's on behalf of writing, I hope."

In addition to his long-term government post, Pinsky edits the online journal Slate and contributes to "The News Hour with Jim Lehrer" on PBS.

He has taught in the Boston University graduate program since 1988, and lives in Newton Corner, Massachusetts, although his Long Branch, New Jersey accent hints at his birthplace. Before that, he taught at the University of California at Berkeley.

"A side of me wants to try anything," Pinsky said in a recent New York Times article. Critics have called Pinsky's award-winning 1994 translation of the Inferno "the premier modern text for English language readers to experience Dante's

When signing copies of his translation, Pinsky scrawls his name and adds, "I hope that you enjoy the hell out of it" beneath.

Pinsky's nature lingers in the words. Words concern Pinsky; he does not merely weigh them in his mind. "I write with my ear and my voice," he explained in a recent interview. "The physical sounds of words are my clay, my material."

Pinsky's "material" is difficult to classify; his poetry resonates with image and sound—combining Judeo-Christian themes with rich description and often waxes autobiographical.

A prolific writer, he has published criticism, poetry, and prose; several of his publications have received prestigious awards and praise.

Pinsky did not always aim to write, nor did he plan to "be a writer." At the age of 15, he bought a saxophone; he vowed to be a Jazz musician. His poetry now provides an outlet for the musician in him.

"My whole life's work has been that of a frustrated saxophone player," he joked in a recent interview. This perhaps explains some of his love for rhythm, sound, and flow within poetry: "Poetry," according to Pinsky, "is a vocal, which is to say, a bodily, art. The medium of poetry is a human body: the column of air inside the chest, shaped into signifying sounds in the larynx and the mouth. In this sense, poetry is just as physical or bodily an art as dancing."

On Oct. 3rd, the "vocal, bodily Art" of poetry will come alive within Vaughan Literature Auditorium. We will listen; the words will, if we allow them, rise "like a column of air" within us. And for now—in much the way that Pinsky describes his art—we dance in anticipation.

"I Am Beautiful" series concludes

Speakers strive to rid all women of a negative self-image

By Sarah Gudenkauf

The second of the three-part "I Am Beautiful" series took place during Parents' Weekend, from 2-4:30 p.m. last Sunday in Hunt Hall.

The founders of the "I Am Beautiful" series and Sole Sisters Inc., Woody Winfrey and Dana Carpenter, led discussions and activities focusing on women's issues. Such issues included self-image, eating disorders and body hatred.

The seminar's participants discovered that, in addition to the overwhelming percentage of young women who suffer from body image problems, the majority of women of every age struggle to maintain positive self-esteem. Many of the activities focused on the theme of discovering the positive qualities in each individual. The seminar aided all participants in proudly affirming, "It's what's on the inside that counts."

Students, University staff and members of the Lewisburg community, gathered in Hunt Hall to explore, learn and appreciate one another; the seminar was designed to celebrate every aspect of a woman's life.

The seminar began with the participants reading aloud excerpts from the book I Am Beautiful, of which Winfrey and Car-penther are co-editors. Winfrey and Carpenter compiled the text with essays written by women of a variety of ages and ethnicity on a number of topics. The idea for the book arose out of a desire to create something to illustrate the experiences of many different women. They wanted to create something that would offer positive role models for both their daughters and the public.

Winfrey then led the group in a meditation designed to help the participants celebrate the diversity of their bodies. They focused not on the outward appearance of each woman's body but on the ideas, the group split into teams of three for an activity designed to provide an outlet for each woman to express a fear or personal conflict. Then two other women in each group then attempted to assuage her fears by providing positive feedback.

The final individual activity was designed to help each woman to express all of the negative thoughts and ideas she associated with herself. In turn, each woman countered these ideas with all of the positive aspects they saw in themselves and in their lives.

Finally, the group reconvened, closing with a session during which each woman expressed all that she learned from the day's experience.

Throughout the seminar, Winfrey and Carpenter posted a quote: "She wins who calls herself beautiful and challenges the world to change to truly see her."

The series, sponsored by the Women's Resource Center, Community Health Promotion, and Psychological Services, continued on Monday from 10 a.m. to noon in the Bookstore with both editors, Winfrey and Carpenter, signing copies of their book. The series then came to a successful close on Monday at 7:30 in the LC forum when part three was presented. A slide show and lecture featured the stories from I Am Beautiful.

A Cappella groups impress students, parents at Christy's

All three groups perform new material during the two sold-out shows at Rooke Chapel during Parents' Weekend

By Katie Marston

Approaching Rooke Chapel this past Friday or Saturday evening, one could not help but marvel at the sweeping line of students, faculty, parents and friends waiting to enter.

Christy's, an annual concert and Parents' Weekend treat, features Bucknell's three a cappella groups—The Silhouettes, Two Past Midnight and The Bison Chips. The musical fiesta is named in honor of Bucknell alumnus Christy Mathewson and has been a favorite of students and parents alike for years.

After frantically scanning the chapel for the perfect seat, audience members were introduced to the newly selected freshman women voices in The Silhouettes. Each new member stood before the crowd and recited a few lines of such popular songs as Sara McLachlan's "I Will Remember You," while dressed as the particular artist. Other girls dressed like Britney Spears, Christina Aguilera and Macy Gray while presenting a sampling of each artist's music. Finally, once all of the members were on stage, they opened their program with Billy Joel's upbeat and powerful "For the Longest Time" by Billy Joel. Brett Russo '01 sang Leanne Rimes's "How do I Live," a new addition to the group's routine. Sara Mastrony '03 sang the popular Dave Matthews Band song "Say Goodbye," which she arranged herself. The Silhouettes ended their performance with their usual "Lullabye," also by Billy Joel.

As the women exited the chapel stage, the coed group Two Past Midnight made their entrance with an Andy Kaufman theme, setting the audience into explosions of laughter. The group then proceeded to sing back up to Junior Blaze Berdahl, as she sang another favorite, Sonia Dada's "Lover." Two Past also performed a new song "The General," by Dispatch, with sophomore Brian Strojny as lead singer. The group ended with their traditional closer, "In the Still of the Night," with soloist Matt Griffin '02.

good luck from Two Past Midnight, the all-male Bison Chips introduced their freshmen with a comical Chipendale theme. The two new members, dressed in seductive attire, made several suggestive poses in the style of male strippers while a narrator defined their moves. Giving the audience a good laugh, the group then continued with their show.

Junior Alex McCausland performed a hilarious imitation of Frank Sinatra's "Fly Me to the Moon." During the show, two alumni joined the present Bison Chips to help entertain the crowd and relive their Bucknell days. The chapel sighed as Christopher Halldorson '01 sang his usual "Lady in Red," just before The Chips' finale, "Coney Island Baby." The men invited the crowd to come see them again on Homecoming Weekend when they will have over 60 alumni joining them.

After about 90 minutes of musical bliss and pure entertainment, the attentive audience said good-bye to the performers and walked away with smiles on their faces. For those who wanted more of the talented singers, each a cappella group's CD and cassette tape was on sale at the door and can also be purchased at the Bucknell Bookstore. Additionally, the Silhouettes are going into the recording studio this fall, and Two Past Midnight is in the process of mixing a CD they recorded last year.

Two Past Midnight member Blaze Berdahl '02 said, "there is no more enthusiastic audience than the one that comes to Christy's every year on Parent's Weekend." There is no doubt that the audience and the performers are already looking forward to next year's Christy's performance.

Savage/Love explores relationships

Renee Brody '01 directs the half-hour play about love

By Jennifer Johnson

Savage/Love, a half-hour collaboration of short poems by Sam Shepard and Joseph Chaikin, will be performed at 8 p.m. in the black box theatre of Tustin this Friday and Saturday night.

Directed by Senior Theater minor Renee Brody, the play will portray the intricacy of relationships between lovers. Brody is directing her second theatre showcase at Bucknell.

Last year she directed The Most Massive Woman Wins by Madeleine George. Brody describes the difficulty of directing this play Savage/Love.

"The play is a collection of poems and vignettes. This makes it extremely challenging to direct because there are no characters or plot. The actors and musicians had to do much improvisation in order to explore the emotions Shepard and Chaikin placed within the words," Brody said.

According to Brody, one of the goals of this play is to integrate her music major and theater minor in the production. Along with actors Ibbey Cizmar '03, Ben Turits '03, Kate McDevitt '01, Misty Trezona '02 and Trevor Rutledge-Leverenz '01 there are three musicians performing in the play. Curtis Olson '02 will play the trumpet, Jennifer Johnson '01 will play the flute and David Halpern '02 will play percussion.

The play strives to describe the powerful emotions of relationships through words, music and movement. Sam Shepard wanted music in his plays because of his background as a drummer. According to Brody, he considers himself a musician before a playwright, and he wanted to explore the musicality of words.

The play was choreographed by Shauna Sobers '01. Savage/Love is a collaboration that Chaikin describes as "common poems that involve real and imagined moments in the spell of love."

Imagine all of this jammed into a half-hour for just one dollar.

"Anyone who has ever loved should come and see it," Brody said.

Improv troupe brings laughs and originality

By Natalie Casp

Full of laughs and spontaneous skits, the comedy improv troupe "We Brake for Nobody" performed in front of parents and students Friday night in the LC Forum.

What started as a group of six students playing improv games in a dorm basement turned into an official University organization. Tired of being kicked out of the Trax TV room by "Beverly Hills, 90210" fans, Ben Wellington '02 formed "We Brake for Nobody" in 1998 in order to schedule rehearsal space.

The group now has over 20 members, 11 of whom perform regularly.

Styled after the format of CBS's "Whose Line is it Anyway?," "We Brake for Nobody" takes suggestions never knows the exact content of an evening's performance.

"We take suggestions from the audience and turn them into skits, songs and situations right on the spot. Every show is completely different and depends on the audience's suggestions," Wellington said.

"We Brake for Nobody" performs monthly on campus in the Bison, LC Forum and is in the planning stages of their second "tour of the dorms." The shows will take place in the common room of each lounge, giving the residents an entertaining study break.

The group also performs at Lycoming college in Lycoming, Penn., and at the Outlook Point Retirement Center in Lewisburg. "We Brake for Nobody" will also travel to Georgetown University later this year to perform in the University's annual improv fest.

Senior soloists perform in concerto concert

The Bucknell University Orchestra pleases audience in first concert of the year

By Natalie Casp

In its first performance of the semester, the Bucknell University Orchestra presented a concerto concert for students and parents. Three soloists joined conductor Christopher Para in playing pieces by Mozart, Hoover, Stamitz and Bizet.

Flutist Jennifer Johnson '01, violinist Megan Rancier '01 and clarinetist Jennifer Sikora '01, along with the 65-member orchestra, played Friday evening in the Weis Center for the Performing Arts.

Para, both enthusiastic and energetic, introduced each piece by describing its musical and historical background to the attentive audience. Para encouraged the audience to "hear the drama" in "Bizet's L'Arlesienne Suite No. 1."

"This piece has a musical presence and a wonderful mid-movement sound from the saxophone, which is a very rare treat," Para said.

Rancier's delicate stage presence during her solo, "Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 3 in G Major, K. 216," complimented Para's lively and almost gleeful conducting. Standing solemnly and seriously, Rancier charismatically filled the open space of the Weis Center with a dramatic performance.

"I was ecstatic to perform in the Weis Center with the Orchestra. I've wanted to do this since freshman year... and now I've done it. I was happy with my performance—the cadenza at the end was my favorite part," Rancier said.

Opening the concert with Rancier's solo pleased other members of the Orchestra as well. "She played beautifully—she truly demonstrated wonderful musical insight and rich tone," violinist Andrew Clugston '01 said of Rancier.

The second piece of the evening, Hoover's "Medieval Suite for Flute and Orchestra," was derived from a novel.

"We take a huge leap in time and sound [from Mozart] when playing Hoover... Inspired by Barbara Tuckman's 'A Distant Mirror,' this five movement piece paraphrases the bubonic plague," Para said.

With poise, confidence and elegance, Johnson captured the audience with graceful control of Hoover's composition. Fast-paced and on the prowl, the second movement mimicked the spread of the plague. Johnson mastered the intricacy of the movement with fervor. While conveying the rumbling and demonic mood of the piece, Johnson performed Hoover's composition dramatically and almost seductively.

"I enjoyed the eerie and aggressive auras of the two movements," Johnson said. Johnson began working on the piece at the end of the spring semester.

The last of the solo performances, Sikora's clarinet solo in Stamitz's "Clarinet Concerto No. 3 in B-flat Major," presented a classic symphonic sound to the audience.

Para, too, offered high praise for the piece. "It's deliciously lyrical and beautifully crafted."

Sikora played the difficult, breathless solo with charming authority.

The Orchestra began practicing for the Parents' Weekend concert at the beginning of the fall semester. With only a month of practice, the members of the ensemble were pleased.

"For the amount of time we had, I think the Orchestra pulled together rather well," violinist Lauren Rudick '01 said.

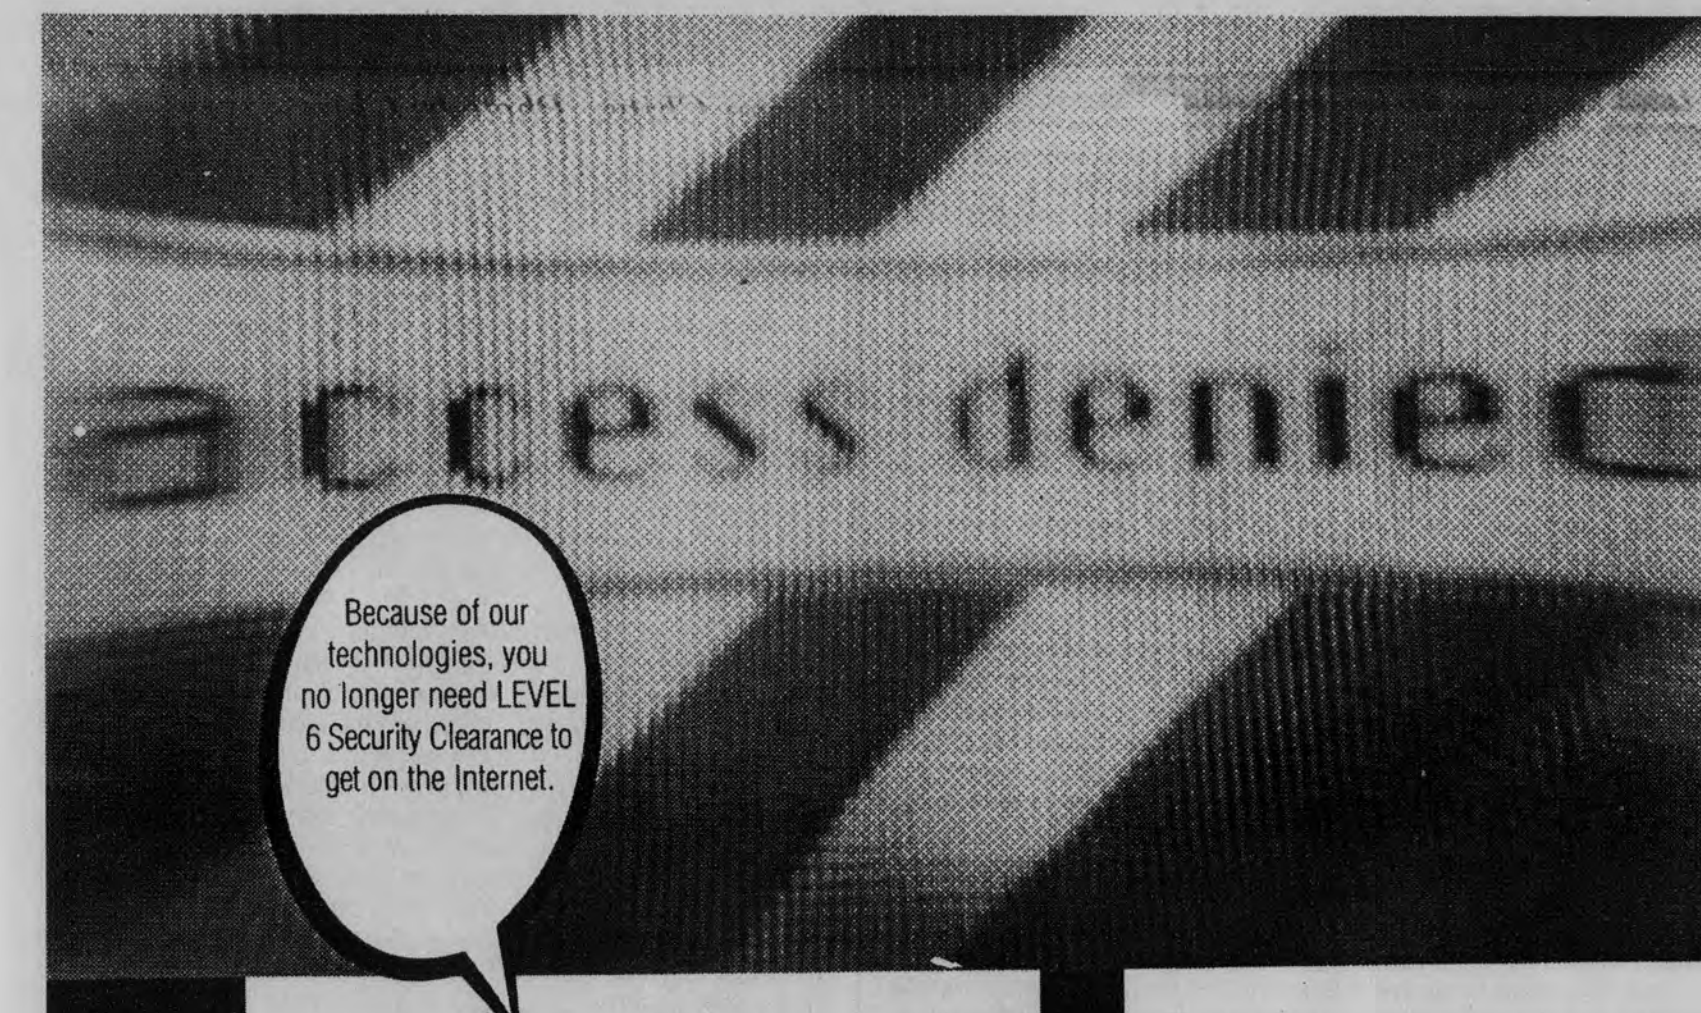

"We are a fairly efficient working music machine striving towards the common goal of perfection," Clugston said. "Our conductor never asks for much, just perfection."

And perfection is what the audience heard Friday evening. Look for another performance by the Orchestra during President Rogers' inauguration in October.

Making light of the campaign

Gore entertains audience on "The Tonight Show with Jay Leno."

By Josh Guyan

What's your favorite sandwich?

That's the kind of challenging question Vice-President Gore and Governor Bush had to face during Oprah's grilling. Obviously, cornering candidates on the issues is not what talk shows are meant to do. Featuring presidential candidates on talk shows is supposed to give the public a chance to get to know the candidates better, to really understand what kind of people they are.

Both political candidates have been making good use of talk shows lately. Gore has done Leno, Letterman and Oprah. Bush has done Letterman, Oprah, and most recently, Regis. The Gore campaign even has Senator Lieberman doing Conan and "The Daily Show" with Jon Stewart.

Appearing on these kinds of shows is good for both candidates politically. Gore uses humor on the late-night shows like Leno to contradict his supposedly wooden and stiff image. Surprisingly it was the Democratic Convention that actually helped Gore the most to shed that uptight image, but the talk shows have helped too.

Bush has used shows like Oprah and Regis to attempt to cut into Gore's significant lead among women. Over two-thirds of Oprah's viewers are women and Bush successfully held himself out as a compassionate family man, hoping to close the gender gap. In the latest CNN poll, Bush has gone up five points with women.

So far a consensus has formed with political pundits and commentators that this is a good thing for the American public to see. The one true critic of candidates on talk shows has been Bill Maher on "Politically Incorrect." He believes it is not the job of the media to make candidates look more "human." The media's job is to criticize and challenge the candidates, forcing them to defend their positions and choices.

Maher points to the growing trend of talk-show staffs writing lines for candidates. Both Gore and Bush have had material written for them by the late-night talk shows. Maher says this practice gives the American people a false sense of the candidates' personalities... essentially that they have one.

Maher certainly has a good point, but the media can easily be divided up into various groups. Part of the media is comprised of professional journalists whose job it is to criticize and analyze the various candidates. For this reason we still need the candidates to sit down with Tim Russert, Wolf Blitzer, Barnard Shaw and George Will.

But there is another group in the media whose job it is to entertain and deal with personalities. The American public should know that Oprah and Regis aren't going to really challenge the candidates. They are just going to have a nice chat to find out what movies Gore and Bush like, and that is fine as long as we recognize that for what it is.

European drivers feel the effects of the recent increase in gas prices.

Showing OPEC who's boss

Remember the good old days when mom and dad filled up your sweet-16 navy blue SUV with premium unleaded, and it didn't come out to $60? Remember the days when your English uncle, Wilfred, could pay for his gas and still afford a few dozen pizzas. Yeah, I do too, although I don't apply to either of those categories. I remember when I could cash my embarrassing movie theatre check, buy some gas for my hand-me-down car, and still not be totally devastated right after.

Even if I was only making $4.00 per hour. Will we ever be able to see those more reasonable gas prices again? I say we can.

Let's get down to the root of the problem, both here, and abroad. Europe is currently paying more than it ever has for gas, and it is becoming harder to come by. England is now paying the equivalent of around $4.50 for a gallon of gas. Germany is now paying the equivalent of around $4.50 for a gallon of gas. Why are they paying triple our current prices (which average about $1.60)?

The answer lies in the taxes. Western Europe isn't like the United States. The government tries and succeeds at attempting to get people to use their very efficient public transportation. Motorcycles are more common than cars, from an observer's point of view. Cars just aren't as necessary as they are here.

England is currently paying $3.46 per gallon in taxes alone. Germany pays $2.40, which amounts to 20% of the government's revenue. The problem is that the truckers of Europe, almost all self-employed, don't have a choice, and their clients are unwilling to pay more for shipping. The truckers we keep seeing on the news aren't the usual trade union types, but are actually led by the truck workers themselves, blocking gas stations, a boycott of taxes that is too severe.

Yes, I know, OPEC is the culprit, not these governments who are simply doing what they have always done. OPEC has raised the price of oil, and the output has been nominal. However, battling their cartel may not produce any quick results, and OPEC's history shows us that being the cartel it is means it could happen again, and most likely will. For Western Europe, it's time to start thinking about adjusting their affordable income taxes to help undo the burden of the gas taxes.

The U.S. has a different concern with the increase in oil prices, a totally reasonable solution to the problem, though it has nothing to do with tapping our Strategic Oil Reserve. Thirty million barrels will be added to the U.S. oil supply. While this increased supply won't be reflected in gas prices until November, it will last for less than four weeks, and then prices will return to levels before the price hike.

The genius behind the whole operation is Secretary of Energy, Bill Richardson. If there was one person who was responsible for putting political pressure on OPEC, it was he. A report in "The Oil Daily" last year stated that Richardson actually urged OPEC nations to curb production in order to help bring the prices back up to the level they were at in 1998. As the secretary of energy, Richardson can also claim fame for the breaches of security at the Los Alamos Plant.

Despite Secretary of Treasury, Larry Summers, and Federal Reserve Chairman, Alan Greenspan, advising otherwise, Richardson went ahead and recommended the release of 60 million barrels. The Clinton-Gore administration signed, with pride, executive orders that disallow any oil mining in Alaska. Guesses about the amount sitting below the surface is in the area of over 20 billion barrels, about a 30-year supply. Environmentalists warned 20 years ago that the trans-Alaska pipeline would be detrimental to the environment; all claims have since been proven false.

The problem doesn't just lie in the importation of oil. If we imported more oil, we couldn't do anything with it. Our oil refineries are working at 95 percent capacity. Since 1992 there hasn't been a new refinery built. Our reliance on OPEC has risen from 50 percent to 59-60 percent. OPEC nations like Iraq control our supply side of oil.

It's time to take matters into our own hands and let Saddam find a new top client to toy with.

U.S. votes to lift trade restrictions on China

By Melissa Finkelstein

In the boldest foreign policy initiative since the Nixon era, the United States has voted to lift trade restrictions on China, the most populous nation in the world.

In an address delivered on Sept. 19th following the decision, President Clinton said, "America has more influence in China with an outstretched hand, than with a clenched fist."

This landmark decision will mean that the United States' annual review of trade relations with this communist state is no longer in effect. Rather, China's concessions to join the World Trade Organization mean that going forward, China will have an open market. The implications of the cessation of restrictions are far reaching for both China and the United States.

Recent foreign policy in regards to China has been conducted in an effort to force the Chinese government to curb communism, and end human rights violations. However, it has been argued that a restrictive policy has actually angered Chinese leaders. The Chinese government has felt that the restrictions against them should not be linked to their history with human rights issues.

Now, the United States hopes to influence China through a new economic strategy. Officials suggest that a policy of open trade may infiltrate China with Western ideals regarding government and human rights.

"One thing is certain for both those in favor and those opposed to Tuesday's decision: Americans wish to see political changes in China."

Hopefully, the words of our President will ring true.

change will dim the role of government in people's daily lives and strengthen those within China to fight for higher labor standards, a cleaner environment, for human rights, for rule of law."

While this shift in policy may seem to contradict the Clinton era aim to shape social change through economic policy, this is not the case. Rather, the lifting of trade restrictions is a different strategy used to promote American ideals of freedom and prosperity for the Chinese. This trade agreement is in accordance with the foreign policy that has characterized this communist state.

Clinton's term, as economic initiative is being used to orchestrate a political agenda in China.

The new agreement will also have a significant impact on U.S. businesses. Analysts expect revenues to increase by billions of dollars, in response to the opening of Chinese markets.

Despite the apparent benefits of the lifting of restrictions, there are skeptics. One can't help but ponder where the United States' real interests lie.

"We are putting profits over people," Senator Jim Bunning of Kentucky told MSNBC last week. "It's plain wrong and its un-American."

Deep rifts and bitter opposition have characterized past policy with regard to communist states, and though human rights violations continue to plague the international community, the Clinton administration seems to be seeking unity.

Keystone sells out

By Amanda Kaufman

A few weeks ago, the bank University students have come to call their own underwent major restructuring.

On Sept. 5, Keystone Financial Inc. stockholders approved a merger with M&T Bank Corporation. The move is one of many recent bank mergers, as large conglomerates are squeezing out the smaller operations.

Executives of Harrisburg-based Keystone said 91.4 percent of shareholders who cast ballots voted for the merger. Shareholders were told that Keystone's 177 banking offices in Pennsylvania, Maryland and West Virginia would become M&T banks on Oct. 6 if M&T stockholders approve the acquisition.

Also on September 5, M&T shareholders approved M&T's merger with Keystone Financial Corporation as well as an amendment to M&T's certificate of incorporation necessary to split its common stock 10-for-1.

Not all of the Keystone shareholders are pleased with the merger, as their annual dividends shrunk to 50 cents a share with the close of the deal. Currently, they receive $1.16 a share. One Keystone shareholder, John Feko, said, "The only good thing that's come out of (the merger) is the Keystone stock's appreciated 46.4 percent since the day before the deal was announced on May 17."

Under the terms of the merger agreement, Keystone shareholders can either receive one-half of a post-split share of M&T common stock or $21.50 in cash in exchange for each outstanding share of Keystone common stock. Sixty-five percent of the shares of Keystone common stock outstanding when M&T agreed to the merger will be converted into M&T common stock and the remaining 15 percent of the Keystone shares will be converted into the right to receive cash.

In addition, M&T's Board of Directors declared a 10-for-1 common stock split. The effect will be an increase in outstanding shares of M&T's common stock from 7,677,211 to 76,772,110 based on shares outstanding on Sept. 18, 2000. The additional shares will be distributed on or about Oct. 5, 2000.

The story, however, does not begin with the merger. Keystone has had periodic financial trouble in its 16-year history, including last year's settlement in a financial scandal involving a Keystone subsidiary. Earlier this year, Keystone agreed to pay $50 million to 45 school districts and five municipalities in Pennsylvania to settle a class-action lawsuit filed against one of its subsidiaries, Mid-State Bank.

In the case, John Gardner Black, an investment adviser used by the local governments and school districts, pleaded guilty to mishandling investments resulting in $71 million in losses between 1994 and 1997. Mid-State Bank provided custodial services for Black's business, Devon Capital Management.

Keystone is not the only bank being taken over recently. Big banking chains such as Chase and PNC are able to offer a wider range of services at a low cost to the customer, while the small banks do not have the resources to do so. PDA's: It's all in the palm of your hand

Can you remember life before email?

Those who use a Personal Digital Assistant (PDA) can't fathom how they functioned before this handheld device entered their life.

Used for keeping track of telephone numbers, addresses, to-do lists and finances, as well as for reading and composing email and viewing web pages, PDAs are practical for most anyone, not just executives on a tight schedule.

Most handhelds are simple to use; perhaps the most difficult thing is keeping the lingo straight. With so many different models and operating systems, it's easy to confuse the handheld devices.

Ranging from 2MB up to 32MB of RAM, the devices cost anywhere from $149-$599. Most models are easily expandable and vary in capabilities. Cell-phone add-ons, digital camera modules and memory and modem expansion slots are also optional additions for some of the higher-end personal PCs.

Palm, Sony, Handspring, Compaq, Hewlett-Packard, Psion and Phillips make some of the better selling models. Palm, Sony and Visor incorporated the operating system PalmOS into their handheld PCs. Hewlett-Packard, Psion and Phillips run a Windows-based operating system, giving the user a more familiar platform.

Palm offers four different series with each containing several models. Every Palm comes with HotSync capabilities that allow the user to synchronize information between the handheld device and a desktop computer.

The Palm m100, the simplest Palm model available, provides the basics in handheld computing at a moderate $149. For about $50 to $100 more, the Palm III series offers expandability, increased memory and more applications than the m100. CNET.com ranks the IIIx and IIIe as the best two handhelds on the market.

The lightweight, sleek Palm-Vx, ranked third by CNET, retails for a hefty $399 but comes with the most memory of any Palm. The Vx model is highly expandable, and Omniskit now offers a modem attachment for the Vx. For $39.95 per month, subscribers have access to unlimited modem service in any part of the country—including Lewisburg.

Handspring's Visor and Visor Deluxe are comparable to Palm's IIIe and IIIx, both in pricing and user features. Handspring's models use a USB port for its HotSync technology, while the Palm uses a slower serial port.

By using the WindowsCE operating system, brands like Compaq, Hewlett-Packard, Psion and Phillips are more familiar to some users, but models with WindowsCE deplete battery power quickly because the operating system requires more RAM.

Color models, though quick to drain battery life, are now available too. Jason Rubinstein '04 opted to purchase the Phillips Nino rather than a handheld from the popular Palm line.

"I found this one more appealing because it was Windows-based. I am more familiar with that interface rather than Palm's. Also, it's color and I believe at the time Palm didn't have a color model. It was actually less expensive than a Palm, too," Rubinstein said.

Though most commercials and advertisements tend to market the subway-riding working world, students have found creative uses for their handheld devices. Rather than hauling around a day planner and stuffing numerous Post-it notes and to-do lists in a bulky binder, a PDA eliminates this paper trail and keeps all your information in one slender, digital device.

Cheryl Brooks-Williams '01 said, "It's pretty much my life. I went from the big planner with everything in it to one compact handheld unit that does it all. I use it all the time."

Some argue that handheld devices do everything you can do with paper. But can your writing music and poetry. It's been a great investment. While not as stylish as the Palm Vx, it was more practical for the price.

Get your hands on a handheld device and you too will wonder how you kept your life organized without one.

These are just some of the standard features found on most units. A wide variety of shareware and software is also available to enhance the capabilities of any device.

"I added a small drawing program called Diddle, upgraded to the scientific calculator, and added an encryption program called Secret," John Belding GR said. "Secret makes it impossible to get certain data off of the PDA without a password. If you don't have it, there are some workarounds for the protections built into the palm."

This may sound a bit extreme, but if you lose your PDA, any private information, such as credit card numbers, stored passwords or confidential information, can be seen by whoever finds it.

With the rapid development of new software, handheld devices become more practical and efficient by the day. Palm IIIx, user George Saj '01 actually worked on designing software for handheld devices.

"This past summer I worked with small computer devices in my internship, so this made it even more exciting because I could develop software for it," Saj said. "I use my Palm as a scheduler, for taking notes, and even writing music and poetry. It's been a great investment. While not as stylish as the Palm Vx, it was more practical for the price."

Baja team prepares for new design

As students strive to win competition, team faces challenge with BSG funding cuts

By Michael Donick

All senior engineering students must complete a senior design project—some are just more fun than others.

A favorite in the mechanical engineering department is the Mini Baja car, a rugged off-road racing vehicle. As one of the more challenging projects available to engineers, a team of students redesigns the Baja car every year to compete in a national competition sponsored by the Society of Automotive Engineers.

Over 150 colleges and universities participate in three competitions set-up in eastern, mid-western and western regions of the country. The cars must be designed and built in accord with strict rules regarding safety and engine specifications.

The cars are tested against each other over three grueling days of events, including land maneuverability, top speed, acceleration, braking, suspension and water maneuverability tests. The Bucknell Mini-Baja Team regularly participates in the eastern competition, which requires cars to be able to float and operate in water in addition to rough terrain.

The competition culminates with a rigorous four-hour all terrain endurance race. Due to past experience and knowledge accumulated by the team members, this year's team has the best chance at victory that Bucknell has seen in years. The team has a wealth of automotive experience, knowledge, and excitement that is sure to help them create a winning design.

Team of the Week:

The men's soccer team won its first Patriot League contest at home since '95 with a 3-0 victory over Colgate Saturday. They followed this with a 3-0 win over Monmouth yesterday.

Athlete of the Week

Melissa Maher '02

By David Tomaino

Fear is something that never enters the mind of a kamikaze pilot during a mission, or of Evel Knievel as he jumps a pile of burning cars to safety.

Fearless is a good way to describe the play of Bucknell field hockey phenom Melissa Maher '02. Head coach Heather Lewis agrees. "Melissa is not afraid to put it all on the line—she's fearless," Lewis said.

That fearless attitude has translated to goals in crucial stages of games for Maher. This week was no exception, as Maher netted game-winning goals in both of Bucknell's contests.

In a 3-2 overtime win over LaSalle, Maher tallied two goals, the second notching the victory in overtime. Following that effort with a stellar performance against archrival Lafayette, Maher chipped in the game-winner in a hard fought, 2-1 win.

Maher's late-game theatrics are not surprising to Lewis. "Melissa has a pure nose for the goal, and a never say die attitude which keeps her motivated throughout the whole game," Lewis said.

Maher leads the Patriot League in game-winning goals with two, and is the leading scorer this year for the Bison with four goals. The word is getting out—Maher is not a stranger to the net.

Her primary focus is on bolstering the Bison team this year, and she has helped pull the women's field hockey team to 4-4 record. "Not once in her tenure has it been about Melissa scoring goals, it's always about 'how can I help this team,'" Lewis said.

That attitude has been contagious and is striking fear into Bi-

Bison defender Melissa Maher '02.

Bison turn table on Leopards

By Jennifer Cruickshank

In a rematch of last season's Patriot League Championship game, the Bucknell field hockey team found revenge and reversed the outcome, defeating Lafayette 2-1, in Easton on Saturday. Winning their second straight game in the past week, the Bison improved to 4-4 on the season and 1-1 in Patriot League play.

Head Coach Heather Lewis expressed great satisfaction with the win over the Leopards. "Any win on the road against a Patriot League opponent is huge for us," Lewis said. "Many people favored Lafayette going into the game, so it was a great win for us down there."

Statistically, Lafayette dominated the game, but it was sophomore midfielder Amy Marvel who was able to light the scoreboard first for the Bison. Granted a penalty shot in the first period of play, Marvel found the back of the net, putting the Bison ahead 1-0 at halftime.

Lafayette, which outshot the Bison 32-7, came out strong in the second half as junior Jill Gulotta tied the game early in the period. Facing a 16-1 penalty corner deficit, the Bison defense, led by sophomore goalkeeper Sonja Wettergreen (14 saves), remained strong and stingy.

"The defense played exceptionally," Lewis said, "and the offense was able to capitalize when given the opportunity."

The difference-maker was forward Melissa Maher '02, who scored her second game-winning goal in as many contests for the Bison with 12:25 remaining in the game.

Maher's game-winner yielded Patriot League Offensive Player of the Week honors. After scoring two goals against LaSalle earlier in the week, Maher leads the team in scoring with eight points on four goals. She also leads the team in Patriot League scoring with two points (one goal).

"Melissa has really capitalized on finishing this week," defender Megan Hopping '02 said. "She just knows how to find the back of the net."

In addition to Maher's honor, junior defender Monica McCorry was named the Patriot League Defensive Player of the Week for her efforts on the other side of the field. McCorry proved to be instrumental in both of Bucknell's victories this week.

Her 10 interceptions against Lafayette and all-around solid play on defense earned her the League honors. McCorry also produced two vital defensive saves in the match against Lafayette.

"Monica was the backbone of the defensive unit," Hopping said. "The ball would be in front of the net, and somehow, out of nowhere, Monica would find a way to come in and hit it out of the zone."

The victory marked only the fifth time in 28 meetings that the Bison have won the match-up with Ursinus, junior Erin Plasteras said. As teammate Lauren Campbell '02 nodded in agreement, Plasteras commented on the team's expectations for yesterday's Ursinus game. "We're going down there to win."

And that's exactly what the Bison did, by a score of 3-2 in overtime. Lauren Campbell '02 netted the second of her two goals with 9:30 remaining in overtime to clinch the victory. Wettergreen was strong in net, posting 11 saves.

The 3-4 Bison (2-1 in the Patriot League) will host Lehigh this Saturday at 1:00 p.m. in an important league match.

Water polo goes 2-2 in league matches

By Brooke Rea

In their first weekend of conference play, the Bucknell men's water polo team went 2-2 at home and pulled out impressive victories against George Washington University and Johns Hopkins.

Facing some of the toughest competitors from their Mid-Atlantic Southern Conference, the Orange and Blue fell to no.16 Princeton and no. 15 Navy, despite hard battles in both contests.

"The two wins we got this weekend were games we should have won," said senior co-captain Kevin Permisohn. "And at this point in the season we need to be a team who wins the games we are supposed to win and challenges the higher-ranked teams. We are doing that, which is good, and going 2-2 still puts us in good league standing."

The Bison started out the weekend with a tough opener against Princeton, in which the Orange and Blue got off to a shaky start and could never quite recover. Early first-quarter goals from seniors Permisohn and Tate Greditzer were hard to repeat as the next two quarters went 1-6 and 0-6 in favor of the Tigers.

"A good first quarter was followed by frustration against a tough Princeton team," head coach John Zeigler said. "We struggled to find the offensive answer we needed, and missed man-up opportunities and shots took their toll on the score."

"Princeton just has a very balanced inside/outside game, with a good hole set as well as strong outside shooters," Permisohn said. "We pretty much shut down their inside game, but we lost the game because of their shooting from the perimeter."

Other goals in the contest came from junior Ryan McCarty in the second quarter and sophomore Dan Londerdal in the fourth. Junior goalie Dave Kennedy had ten saves but BU eventually fell 17-4.

In game two the Bison came out hungry for a win and almost beat fifteenth-ranked Navy. With a 3-1 lead at the half, BU was showing their defensive skill and holding off the Navy attack.

"Our defense was the best of the season," said Kennedy. "Our crash was great on the back end, we just couldn't catch up on offense."

Holding Navy to zero goals in the first quarter, BU tallied two goals from seniors James Mante and Chris Kempton. Each team netted one in the second quarter, leaving BU with a two-point lead at the half. Standout of the contest was goalie Kennedy, who registered an incredible ten saves in the first half.

Offense proved to be a problem for the Bison in the second half, with the only goal coming from Ryan McCarty and too many missed opportunities giving Princeton the opportunity to jump ahead.

Kennedy again had an outstanding half, with eight more saves in the second making a tally of 18 total for the game.

One key factor in the Bison defeat was Navy's ability to draw ejections. Drawing eight kick-outs to Bucknell's zero, Navy created valuable scoring opportunities for themselves and ended up taking the contest 7-4.

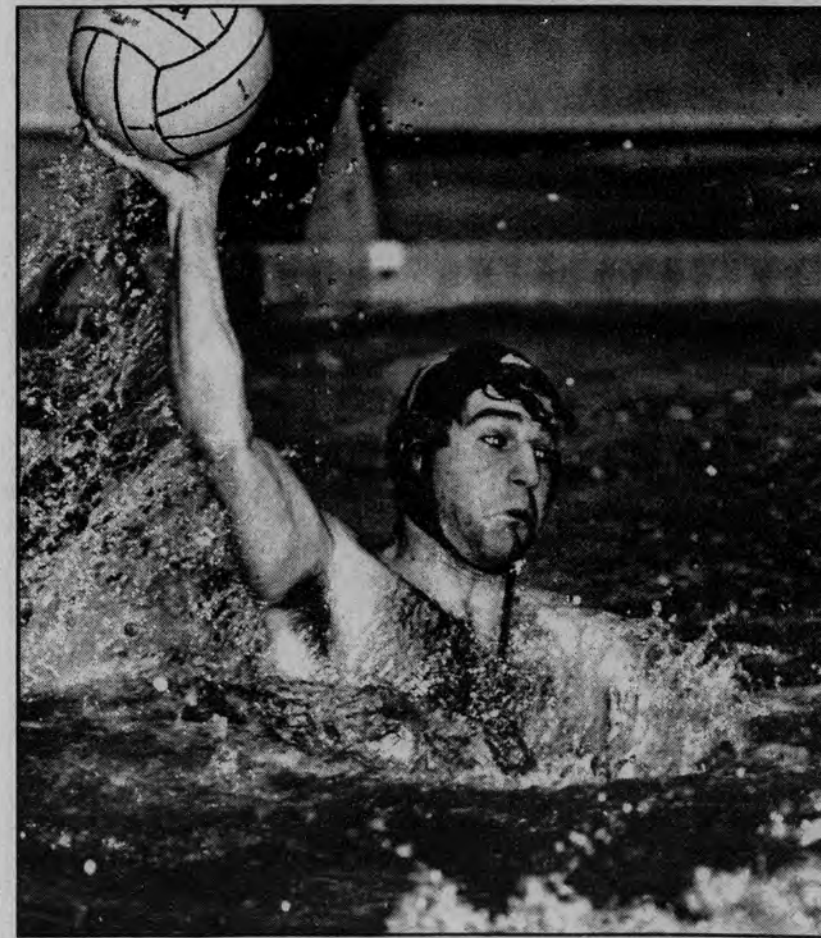

"I felt that we earned some ejections in the deep end that were simply not called by the refs," said Zeigler. "The same calls were made by the refs when Navy was attacking deep on us."

Kennedy felt that the game was a positive point for the Bison, as they almost eked out a win over a team who went on to beat Princeton. "The best thing about the game was that we showed that we can play with one of the best teams on the East..."

—Goalie Dave Kennedy '02

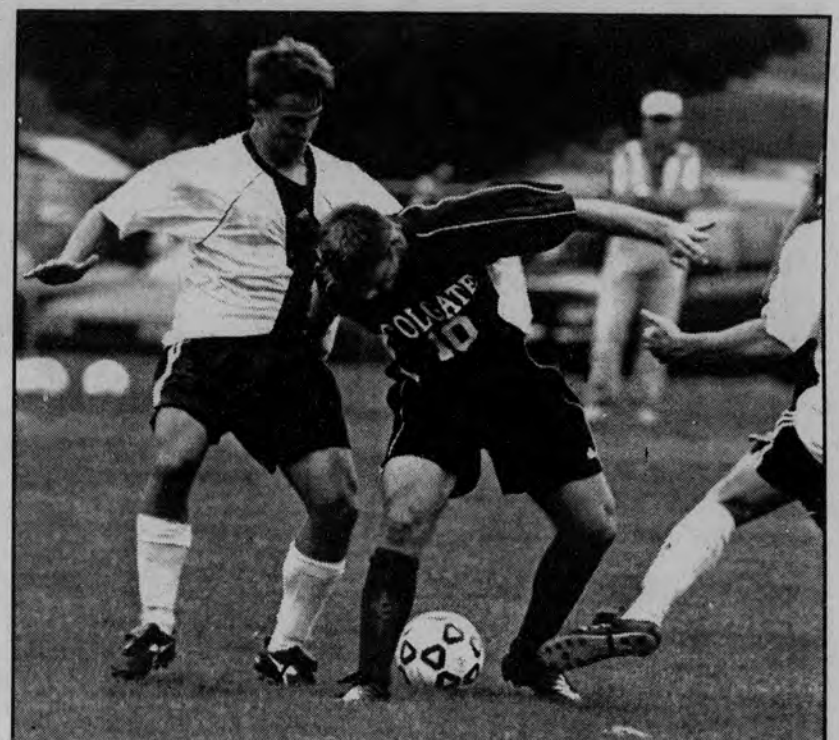

The Bison travel this weekend to Princeton for the North/South Invitational where they will face St. Francis, Queens, Brown and Umass. "This weekend will be a test for us to play against some of the Northern teams to see where we match up in Easterns, which is the ultimate goal," Permisohn said.

"After this weekend we will reassess our goals and figure out what we need to do to achieve them."

Bison end League drought at home

By Katie Yingling

Five years ago Bill Clinton was still in his first term of presidency, we were all still in high school and the men's soccer team had its last home Patriot League victory.

That all changed this past Saturday when Bucknell defeated Colgate 3-0 for their first win at home since 1995. The Bison were coming off of their first Patriot League win against Holy Cross on Sept. 16 when they stepped on the field last Saturday. They were not planning on leaving until they claimed their second.

They did that as senior Geza Lendvai-Lintner scored the eventual game-winning goal just eighteen minutes into the first half. Senior Sam Graziano and sophomore Brian Johnson both assisted on the play.

Seventeen minutes later Chris Beckman '04 scored his second collegiate goal, and the second of the game for the Bison, off of an assist from Elliott Maruffi-Cowley '03.

With a 2-0 lead coming into the second half, junior Andrew Auran placed another ball in the back of the net for the Bison, with Graziano and Lendvai-Lintner assisting. Colgate proceeded to out-shoot the Bison 15-5, but Bucknell's defense stayed strong and freshman goalkeeper Steve Whittaker earned his second shutout of the season.

Whittaker and Lendvai-Lintner were named the Defensive and Offensive Patriot League Players of the Week, respectively, after the game against Colgate.

"It was a very exciting win for all of us," Maruffi-Cowley said, "but we have more big games coming."

The Bison face four nationally-ranked teams in upcoming weeks, along with four more Patriot League competitors.

Yesterday the Bison blanked Monmouth 3-0, with Beckman scoring the game-winner in the fourth minute and Whittaker standing tall in goal for his second consecutive shutout.

"I thought we were flat in the first half," head coach Brendan Nash said. "We came out in the second half, though, and got needed leadership from the seniors and just played soccer like we know how."

Bucknell will host Army on Saturday at 4:00 p.m. and Philadelphia on Tuesday at 7:00 p.m. There are tough games ahead, but with a 2-0 record in the League, the Bison have no reason to stop smiling.

No title, no loyalty in New York

By Rob Schmicker

Do you remember the NBA in the early 90s? Patrick Ewing sure does. From 1990-1993, Michael Jordan led the Chicago Bulls to three straight titles, and three straight years the Bulls eliminated the Knicks from the playoffs. The following two seasons, when MJ retired to play baseball, Hakeem Olajuwon and the Houston Rockets owned the NBA.

But for those five years, the most anticipated showdown was always Chicago vs. New York. While Chicago had superior skills, the Knicks pushed around the smaller, less physical Bulls. Yet, they were never able to win the big one. For a while, that was okay with the New York media. After all, next year would be the year that Patrick Ewing would lead them to the title. But that never happened, and after 15 years of playing in New York, Ewing is headed out west.

Ewing in a Supersonics uniform? It just doesn't seem right. He was the identity of Knicks basketball for more than a decade and will always be associated with the m in the future. But for now, he is gone and New York couldn't be any happier.

And they have a right to be happy. So he led the team to the playoffs for thirteen straight years. Who cares that in his first three years, the Knicks went from 24 victories to 55 and a playoff berth. It doesn't matter that Ewing played through constant pain and that he beat double teams for fifteen years. Shame on him for not winning the NBA title.

When he was drafted No. 1 in the 1985 draft, New York found their savior. They pinned so many expectations on Ewing at such a young age. But he took it all in stride and did everything that was asked of him except winning a title. Does that make him a failure? Not by any means, but Knicks fans will still blame him. For that, I say shame on you for quickly forgetting what Patrick Ewing did for the franchise.

Whether you like Ewing or you don't, the fact is that he is old and it's starting to show. He's 38 with bad knees and is obviously not the player he once was. In last year's Eastern Conference Finals against Indiana, the Knicks were 0-4 with Ewing in the lineup, but 2-0 without him.

But those numbers don't show the whole picture. Ewing was the only inside presence the Knicks had. He was the only player on the team that was willing to bang under the glass for rebounds, and his blocking ability kept players from slashing to the hoop without care. That is something that the Knicks will miss.

As for the deal that has given Seattle their first real center since Jack Sikma, it was one of the biggest and most complicated trades of all time. The Knicks picked up four draft picks and six players, including Glen Rice and Travis Knight from the L.A. Lakers, Vernon Maxwell from Seattle and Luc Longley from Phoenix. The Lakers, in return, received Horace Grant and three other players, while Phoenix swapped centers in receiving Chris Dudley.

So who made out the best? Only time will tell, but for now, L.A. looks to have made out really well. Glen Rice never did fit into the triangle offense, and was only really used as instant offense off the bench. Phil Jackson didn't want Rice to return, but at the same time didn't want to give him up for nothing. So L.A. was able to pick up three-time NBA champion Horace Grant from Seattle.

Jackson coached Grant back in Chicago, and instantly gained leadership. He is a perfect fit for a team that grabbed no rebounds outside of Shaq. Now L.A. has two franchise players, and three proven team players to lead them to another title in 2000-2001.

New York picked up essentially 10 players, but didn't really get better in doing so. Without Ewing they are small up front and have too many swingmen. Rice will compete with Latrell Sprewell, Allan Houston and Erick Strickland for time. Unless another trade is made for a center, the Knicks will be stuck with Luc Longley in the middle. So if they can unload Rice or Sprewell in a package for Mumbo, as is rumored, then they might have what it takes.

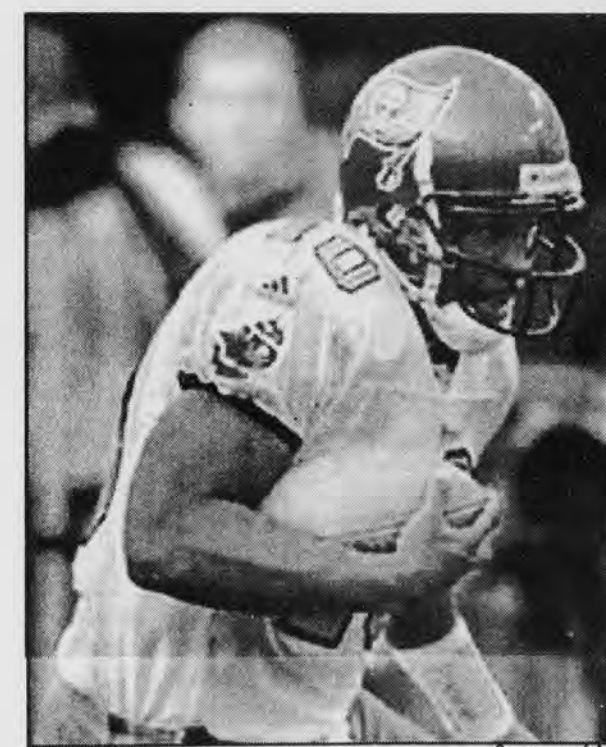

Seattle will be able to win this year, but that might be it—they have an aging team with really no future. Gary Payton was the subject of trade rumors over the summer, Ewing is old and Vin Baker isn't a franchise player to build around. But with the addition of Ewing, Baker can go back to his normal position and should be a top player once again. They will be competitive this year, but unless they get to develop some talent, they are headed in the wrong direction.

So Patrick will not win a title with Seattle, and will retire with no hardware. With MJ in his prime, every other team in the NBA had to take a back seat to the Bulls. But once he left, it was Ewing's turn to shine. Unfortunately, the Knicks weren't able to get it done and Ewing left New York with no championships rings. In a world where loyalty seems to be forgotten, Ewing was blamed and thus traded to Seattle. So instead of being remembered as the best center of his generation, Ewing will unfortunately be remembered alongside Charles Barkley and Karl Malone as the best players never to win a title.

Changing of the guard for NFL QBs

By Aaron DeRosa

Joe Namath, Terry Bradshaw, Joe Montana, John Elway and Shaun King ... wait, who?

Every decade in the NFL has seen great quarterbacks step up to lead their teams to championships only to inevitably fade away. And with the retirement of both Dan Marino and Steve Young this year, it seems that yet another generation has faded, inaugurating in a "changing-of-the-guard" among starting quarterbacks.

In the 2000-2001 season, 14 out of the 31 NFL teams have starting quarterbacks that have never seen, let alone started, more than four full seasons of NFL football. All of these quarterbacks have impressed scouts at the college level, but how will they fare holding the reins of a Pro Football team? Not all of them can lead their teams to the Super Bowl. Many will founder. If you need proof, look up Ryan Leaf, Jake Plummer or Akili Smith. But where some fail, others will succeed and flourish. So who will be the successors to the quarterback throne in this new era of athletes? Here are a few to keep an eye on.

First and foremost among the youngsters is the ever-impressive Peyton Manning. Three years ago, Manning was heralded as the drafted QB of the future. He was the Super Bowl since 1971. Unfortunately, his rookie season was a bust; the team went 3-13 and Manning earned an abominable 71.2% QB rating.

Addressing the issue once in a speech, Manning stated, "The club had risked a lot drafting me number one and essentially banked the team's future on my potential." Fortunately for the Colts, Manning lived up to expectations. In his second season, he soared to the Pro Bowl with a rating of 90.7%, leading the Colts to a 13-3 finish.

So far in 2000, Manning hasn't missed a beat, as his rating hovers at 109%. Building his confidence and preparing himself for every game have been major reasons for his newfound dominance in the AFC. "I have an obsession for preparation," he says. "But, frankly, it has served me well. I know what my strengths and my weaknesses are and I work on both. I make it a habit not to make the same mistakes twice." His tenacity towards personal improvement and drive to win makes him a dangerous young weapon who is at the point in his career where the sky is the limit.

Another amazing talent is Tampa Bay Buccaneers star Shaun King. During his mid-season last year for the injured and inconsistent Trent Dilfer, the 23-year-old King has stepped up beyond wild expectations and has yet to disappoint. Formerly a third stringer, King is a true sportsman and has great respect and admiration for his team.

He trusts his offensive weapons greatly, as evidenced in the season opener against the New England Patriots where he connected with eight different receivers. Figures like that are striking for young quarterbacks who generally find it easier to look for a number one wide-out—like Keyshawn Johnson—on every play. Rather, King shows excellent field vision and reads defenses well. He has confidence in his ability yet also understands that he is still young and has much to learn.

"I always feel confidence in myself. I feel like I can go out and do whatever they ask me to do. I'm also realistic enough to know that there's a lot of stuff that I don't know because of my inexperience." King said, "If I just go out and try to execute the game plan, play smart and try to turn the ball over, and when we get opportunities, make them, then I think we'll be fine."

King is obviously young, having only started nine games in the NFL. Yet his 7-2 mark with an 83% rating along with his approach towards himself, the position, the team and the game make him a consummate professional and a great prospect.

Another name to watch is Tony Banks, the starter for the Baltimore Ravens who has improved his game drastically over the past two years. Now a five-year vet, Banks still finds himself in the same position as youngsters King and Manning because he has yet to be a part of one offensive system for more than a single season. After averaging a dismal 70% QB rating in three years at Saint Louis, Banks was shipped to Baltimore as a third stringer behind two no-names. But as both the 1 and 2 guys failed to produce, Banks stepped up his game on the field and his attitude off.

Known for poor practice habits and relying too heavily on his arm rather than his preparation, Banks was ineffective and unruly early in his career. Yet, under the supervision of coach Brian Billick, Banks has been able to learn the importance of practice and being a team leader, both of which have helped his game immensely.

"In my rookie year I was just basically a gunslinger, running around making throws down the field. My second year I learned a new offense, again," Banks said. "Last year, even though I learned a new system again, I think I practiced better than I ever had ... I'm looking forward to playing in the same offense more than one year."

So far this year he's looked like the leader that the Ravens need with an 86% passer rating. Now backed by a top-ranked defense and new offensive weapons acquired in the off-season, Baltimore seems to be one reliable quarter back away from being a contender. And with Banks' development, the Ravens may just have what it takes.

Other teams also seem to be faring well with their young backs. Rob Johnson, Brian Griese, Cade McNown and Daunte Culpepper are all doing wonderful things in their respective cities. They all seem on the verge of stardom, but only time will tell.

NFL Experts' Picks

By Justin McCarthy and Carmen Mauriello

New York Giants at Tennessee

The Titans had an emotional win last week, with their backup QB being knocked out of the game and then the injured starter, McNair, coming in to lead them to victory. The Titans running game was shut down last week against a defense equal to that of the Giants, so look for the Titans to go aerial with their game plan. Also, judging by the way that Steve McNair played in the final minutes that he came in, he should be ready to start this game. The Titans, who looked potent in every aspect of their game through the first three weeks, finally showed the Giants of old. The Giants will need to improve their secondary, which gave up close to 300 passing yards last week. The Giants will need to protect Collins better against the steady pass rush of the Titans. Also, they will need the return of their thunder and lightning rushing attack—which was dormant last week. Barber and Dayne need to be effective in order to relieve pressure on Collins; that is the only reason why the Giants offense has been so effective in past weeks. In this clash between the Titans and the Giants, the Titans will be slain.

Justin's pick: Giants 20-13

The Titans are lacking some of the magic from their run to the AFC Championship last season—especially with Eddie George pulling a disappearing act. The Giants are coming off a thrashing by the Redskins, and they may feel as if they have to prove that their early-season success was no fluke. I think it comes down to this: the Giants want it worse. In a gritty, hard-hitting battle, this will propel the G-Men to a victory.

Carmen's pick: Giants 13-10

Tampa Bay at Washington

Washington finally played up to its potential last week, while Tampa Bay was the victim of its own mistakes as it fell apart late in the game. The Redskins will need to halt the Bucs' running game and put pressure on the young King—all which are things they did last week against the Giants. The Redskins will also need another big game from Johnson; although that may depend on how well his offensive line fares against a Tampa defense which leads the league in sacks. The Bucs will need to protect King and will concentrate their game along the ground. The Bucs lost last week solely because of turnovers, they cannot afford to make those same mistakes and expect to win against quality caliber teams. The Bucs will need to attack Washington's passing game, and prevent the big plays which saved them last week.

Justin's pick: Bucs 31-21

Defense is the name of the game. Tampa Bay's defense is as nasty as they come, and the Skins tried to model the Bucs' unit by adding studs LaVar Arrington and Deion Sanders, among others. The Skins' defense finally showed its potential last week in caging the Giants, but this week will be its true test. Shaun King and the Bucs offense will attack from every angle, and the Keyshawn versus Deion matchup will be a war. But expect big plays to be the difference, and the Skins have more lethal weapons on offense.

Carmen's pick: Skins 21-17

Pittsburgh at Jacksonville

The Jaguars will need to protect Mark Brunell against a much better defense than that of the Colts, who recorded five sacks last week against Jacksonville; the reason for this statistic is the Jaguars' offensive line, which is hurting and full of injuries. Fred Taylor has played one game back, but was not a factor in determining it. The Jaguars will need Taylor to run effectively behind a broken line in order to keep defenses from just rushing at Brunell. The Steelers are slowly improving with every game; however, they still cannot find a way to win although the will is there. The Steelers still depend on their defense to make plays, and if their secondary can then they will have a chance to win. The Steelers will also need to ride "the Bus", and will depend on Bettis to lead the offense.

Justin's pick: Steelers 24-21

It's time for the Steelers to start playing for that top draft pick, because their season is over (Sorry, Ali). They might have played a little inspired football against an injury-depleted Titans team, but they still lost. The Jags are still brooding over their loss to Indy, so expect them to come out of the gates running. Brunell, Taylor and Smith will pace the offense to a dominating performance. And don't count on the Steelers' offense to land a counter punch—they're punch drunk.

Carmen's pick: Jags 35-14

Indianapolis at Buffalo

The Colts may have established their second receiver in Terrence Wilkins, which takes pressure off of Marvin Harrison. Also, the Colts displayed a fantastic defensive show against the Jaguars last week, which should only scare teams more knowing that they have a defensive to backup their superb offense. The Bills possess a great defense, and will need it in order to have a chance of containing Manning. Also, they should not have too much trouble with the run, even with James carrying the ball. The Bills will need to cut down on offensive mistakes in order to maintain momentum, also they will need to attempt to find a running game that has yet to be effective this season. The outcome of this game may come down to the play of each team's secondary; for each will concentrate on potent passing games. Look for these Bills to be pulled under the stampede of the Colts.

Justin's pick: Colts 34-17

This should be the spotlight game for the week. The key matchup is between the high-octane Colts offense and the stingy Bills' defense. I think that the Bills will contain Manning and Co. for the majority of the game, but expect Harrison to sneak free for a game-breaking play. The Bills' offense should be marginally effective, but they will have trouble plugging it into the endzone.

Carmen's pick: Colts 24-14

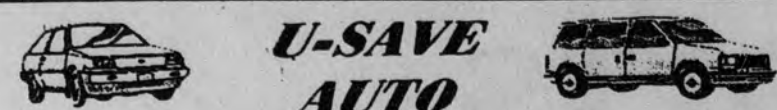

Minnesota at Detroit

Detroit's strength lies in its defense—it had only one offensive touchdown before last week, and it's running game is ranked last in the NFL. Batch will need to keep up with Culpepper in this duel of young quarterbacks. Minnesota can lay back in a zone against the Lions or play man—whichever scheme they choose one thing that is certain is that they will not have to stack the box against the run at all. This will clog up the passing lanes and cause trouble for Batch when throwing downfield over the middle. The Detroit defense will need to contain Culpepper, and place pressure on him from the all sides. Culpepper will need to be watched closely, for he has as big a threat with his arm as he has with his legs when he takes off on a bootleg or a broken play.

Justin's pick: Vikings 23-20

This game is my upset-special. Culpepper has gotten the job done, but he's still prone to mistakes. The Lions will get to him early and often, and expect his bad decisions to lead to turnovers. Detroit's offense will take advantage of the opportunities presented it, and look for a big play from Morton or Crowell.

Carmen's pick: Lions 27-21

Trapassos: the future of BU volleyball

The Trapasso twins have bright futures on the Bison volleyball team.

By Brian Klotz

"Whoa." You might remember one of the scenes from The Matrix in which Keanu Reeves mutters this famous word. It was when he saw the black cat cross the doorway twice. Deja vu, he called it, "A glitch in the system."

Here at Bucknell, you might experience deja vu, but it's not a glitch in the system—or at least we don't think it is. Instead it is identical twins Brandi and Breean Trapasso playing volleyball for the Orange and Blue.

If you have ever seen Brandi and Breean on the volleyball court you might be surprised, as most of their teammates tower over them.
After witnessing their vertiginous however, you lose any different-over height.

"Volleyball-wise we were too short to play Division 1, but Bucknell didn't look at that," said Brandi.

One might find it odd that both sisters decided on the same college, and even more ironically, the same major (math education), but both agreed that coming to Bucknell was largely based on the academic reputation of the school.

"We're both good in school and we liked the small class sizes," said Breean.

"It is a school based around the student-athlete," Brandi said.

The Trapassos started playing volleyball in fifth grade, and formed what quickly became a family sport. Their older sister, one grade ahead, was already playing, and they joined her on the court in club play.

"Ever since we touched a volleyball, we loved it," Breean said.
"We knew it was the sport for us."

Once entering high school at North Towanda, N.Y., the twins played volleyball in school and club, running both indoor and outdoor track in the offseason. In the years that ensued, the three sisters comprised half of the team and went on to claim three state championships in a row.

"We played with the same girls for 8 years," Brandi noted as the reason for such an accomplishment.

In club, the twins also played in six national tournaments during their career.

The transition into college life and volleyball competition was not hard for Brandi and Breean.

"The girls on the team are awesome," Breean stated. "We all mesh really well and we hang out."
Brandi added: "They are really helpful and don't treat us differ-ly because we are freshman."

According to the sisters, the experience of playing together on the same team is never negative. "If one of us messes up, we don't get mad at each other," said Brandi.
"It's also easier to communicate."

"We might get on each other's cases every once in a while, but we don't take it badly," commented Breean. "We win together and we lose together."

About the only thing the two have had trouble with so far this year is having people tell them apart.

"Our personalities are almost identical, and everyone messes up on our names," said Breean.

The twins take much of their motivation on the court from their father. "He's really intense and takes our play very seriously. Even though we live six hours away, he comes to watch us just about every other weekend," said Brandi.

This enthusiasm for volleyball then trickles down through the family tree. "Our whole family loves watching us play," she said.

The distance from home can certainly get tough on the twins, but they have a distinct advantage.
"The whole college thing is a lot easier with a sister around," Brandi said. "There is always someone to hang around with," added Breean.

Goals for this season start from the bottom up. "We have been having trouble finishing matches, so we want to work on that," said Breean.
"But most of all, we want to do well in the Patriot League this season."

Head coach Cindy Opalski commented on what the twins bring to the team.

"They are probably the two best athletes we have had on the team in my tenure here. They are quick, explosive and tremendously exciting to watch."

Women's golf readies for Princeton meet

By Caitly Sellick

After hosting St. Francis and Mount St. Mary's for dual matches last Thursday, the Bucknell women's golf team has been preparing for this weekend's Princeton Invitational.

Bucknell's orange team (the non-traveling team as opposed to the blue team, which will travel to Princeton this weekend) fared well on Bucknell's par-71 course with a team score of 403, the combination of the top four scores from the six players. The top-shooter for Bucknell was junior Bridget O'Mara with a score of 95.

Leading the match was a player from St. Francis with a score of 70, one under par. St. Francis also won the matches with a team score of 322 with Mount St.

Mary's coming in second with a score of 398.

"In regards to the rest of the season I feel that we need to work on being a little more competitive and eliminating the simple mistakes that we have been making," coach Kevin Jamieson said. "I think that this weekend will really show us what we are made of."

This coming weekend, Sept. 30 and Oct. 1, the traveling blue team will head to Princeton to face some of its ECAC competitors, including Penn, William and Mary, Yale and Rutgers and, as in the Dartmouth tournament, Princeton will be the toughest competitor.

Heather Lewis: ideal coach and administrator

By Molly Goeller

"I am a coach who handles administrative responsibilities," states Heather Lewis, a nine-year veteran field hockey coach for Bucknell, when asked to describe her new role at Bucknell after accepting the position of Associate Athletic Director. Her new responsibilities as Associate Athletic Director include sports administration, monitoring gender equity within the department, serving as a liaison for academic affairs and overseeing fourteen of the twenty-eight Bucknell
sports.

Lewis is excited about her new administrative position, but still maintains equally high levels of enthusiasm for her field hockey team.
"It's impressive to see how she handles it. Everyday she comes out to practice, and even knowing all of her responsibilities, we still feel like her first priority," senior captain Brett Russo said.

Lewis feels lucky to be given the opportunity to coach such tremendous athletes. "Coaching and being around the team gives me the balance that I need. I am passionate about the team," Lewis said.

Before coming to Bucknell nine years ago, Lewis had coached at the Deerfield Academy and the University of Massachusetts.
Lewis is quite happy at Bucknell and enjoys her daily interactions with the people of this University. She finds her interactions with her team to be as equally rewarding today as they were nine years ago when she began her employment at Bucknell, saying that she just "loves being around the team."

In hopes of providing the best experience possible for the Bucknell student-athlete, Lewis is fully committed to fostering an environment enabling both academic and athletic excellence. "I would hope that student-athletes can someday look back and say that they have had the best quality experience ever," Lewis said.

Lewis is hopeful that she has provided her student-athletes with a genuine collegiate experience both on and off the field, and her players agree.

"What I like best about Heather, as a coach, is that she has a balanced sense of what being a student-athlete is all about," senior tri-captain Katie Yingling said. "She expects field hockey to be a primary commitment, but recognizes and respects that we have lives outside of field hockey. Because we feel she respects us, we have an incredible amount of respect for her and an intensified commitment to the team."

"As a coach, I take away a sense that I have fostered an extended family," Lewis said. "I have become part of their lives." Lewis wishes to thank her team for providing her with the means to assume her new administrative position.

Managing people is the common bond which links Lewis' coaching talents on the hockey field with her recent administrative responsibilities. Her new position promises to offer her new and challenging responsibilities, yet the true rewards of her job are reflected in her coaching.

"Heather is one of the most amazing people on this campus, with the amount of things she has going on constantly and the way that she seems to balance it all perfectly. She always has a minute to talk, a kind word or a joke," Yingling said. "She never seems too busy for anyone."

Spotlight on club sports: men's rugby

By Michael Morris

The Bucknell men's rugby team, the All-Blacks, won its home opener against Widener, 29-12, last Saturday. The game was a tough and gritty battle between two teams vying for first place within their division.

Play was intense for the first ten minutes of the match, with each side gaining little ground. With some inspirational play by Pete Tulaney '03 and Mike Naporano '01, Bucknell's pack gained command of the game and began to march down the field.

After a strong run by inside center Bill Harrigan '03, the ball was passed to captain Greg Manz '01, who was able to break through Widener's defense to open the scoring.

After converting the kick, Bucknell was up 7-0. A few minutes later, Bucknell again pinned Widener at its end. Harrigan made a vicious tackle, forcing a fumble in Widener's own try zone. Outside center Brian Berkley '01 landed on the fumble to score the game's second try.

Feeding off its own momentum, Bucknell continued to control the game with strong play by Keon Burley '02 and Colin Swank '03. After a Widener penalty, fly half Lucas Bailey '03 gave Bucknell incredible field position with a great kick.

Two plays later, Bailey was able to slice through Widener's defense to give the All-Blacks their third try. With ten minutes left in the first half, Widener was able to mount a drive and scored its first try of the game.

Although the All-Blacks came out gunning in the first half, it was their play in the beginning of the second half that truly displayed their heart and desire for success. After Manz kicked in a field goal, Widener pushed hard down the field.

For what seemed like forever,

Bucknell was forced to make a defensive stand at the goal line. Several times the pack lifted Widener players out of the try zone before they were able to touch down the ball, indicating a score. Wings Chris Miller '03 and Cyrus Mody '04 came up with some huge stops at the goal line.

After continuous rucks and scrums, the pack, led by Naporano, Tulaney, Manz and Scott Roe '03, regained possession. The All-Blacks regrouped after their epic goal line stance to again march down the field.

Berkley received a pass from Bailey and stiff-armed through three would-be Widener tacklers to dive for the back-breaking score.

Manz was pleased with the play of his team. "Our pack did an excellent job maintaining possession," Manz said. "We had some new guys out there who really showed how tough they are."

The All-Blacks were inspired to play with such great intensity. "Before game time, we decided to dedicate this one to our co-captain Piers Causton, who broke his leg in a freak power-walking accident," Naporano said. "We are all pulling for his recovery."

Berkley also showed his appreciation for the inspirational play by the back line. "I was very impressed by the solid, confident play displayed in the back line," Berkley said. "I was especially impressed with the play of freshmen Joe Free, Cyrus Mody and Dan Kelly. They all played like veterans. In his first starting role at wing, Chris Miller also played an intense mistake-free game."

Bailey also thought the freshmen showed great ability. "Joe Free didn't miss a beat and Dan Kelly was solid as fullback," he said. "I thought Bill Harrigan and Brian Berkley played incredibly aggressive games, making sure not to miss a tackle."

The All-Blacks continue their season Saturday at York at 1:00 p.m.

The votes were counted and the winner of the NL East will be the ... Atlanta Braves. Well this would be the case if our votes mattered more than just campus glory. Atlanta, who can considerably be called the team of the 90s is at it again with its dominance of the National League and, more specifically, the New York Mets.

The one hurdle that Mets have not been able to conquer is the nasty tomahawk-chopping Braves, who have the Mets number on speed dial. Again last night the Braves took command and won 7-1 in a crucial series that will decide the NL East. Sure the Mets have improved this year with Mike Bordick, Derek Bell and company, but will it be enough to ride their way to a World Series? I think this is the Mets' year to shine, but let's check out some opinions of other Bucknellians.

Top responses:
I don't think the Mets are going to touch the Braves at this point in the season. Atlanta is showing its best right now, at bat with Chipper and co. picking it up, and on the mound with Glavine and Maddux just on fire recently...and even a certain relief pitcher has been showing up his naysayers quite gracefully. If the Mets were ever going to take this division title, they had their chance earlier, when the Braves went through their yearly phase of forgetting how to play baseball altogether. Now that Atlanta has remembered what to do out there, it's going to be hard for New York to keep up. —Cecily C. Cairns '04

After losing to the Braves, Mets' fans who go home and put on their Yankee apparel will be disappointed again. Bawdy New York fans will only cry harder as Rocker and the Braves will tomahawk chop their way to the top. —Patrick Evans '04

The Mets will catch them because of four reasons:

Who will win the NL East?

■ Mets ■ Braves

1. Piazza is nasty.
2. Rocker fears the Mets.
3. The Mets have been sent on a mission from God.
4. And because the Mets are the best there is, the best there is and the best there ever will be. —Jason Tucker '04

The New York Mets, who started out strong this year against their long time archrivals, are beginning to show that they really don't have what it takes to defeat the Atlanta Braves, who clinched first place in the NL East on Tuesday with a 7-1 decimation of the New York Mets who have now dropped to 4-7 against the Braves this year. —Aaron DeRosa '04

Scheu's collegiate pigskin pick-ems

By Tim Scheu

Featured Game:

#14 Wisconsin @ #9 Michigan
Call this the disappointment bowl. Both teams started the year ranked in the top five, and both teams have had disappointing early season losses to Northwestern and UCLA, respectively.

But things are getting better for Wisconsin. Now that the curious named "shoegate" suspensions are over with, the Badgers are playing with the squad that was supposed to eclipse last year's Rose Bowl championship team. Plus, they can't help but be hungry for a win after the fiasco at Camp Randall last week.

However, they are playing at Michigan and the big house should be rockin'. Not only that but when the Wolverines fumble the ball the Big Ten refs turn a blind eye, as we witnessed in last week's episode in Champaign.

Bottom Line: It does not matter how prolific your offense is—if you are giving up an average of 398 offensive yards per game, you are not going to win the big games. Anthony Thomas is going to run like a kid in a candy shop.

Wolverines 38, Badgers 27

The who-woulda-thunk bowl: #23 South Carolina @ Alabama

You mean to tell me that the team with the longest losing streak in college football prior to this season is ranked in the top 25? And Alabama, who started off as third in the nation, is now 1-3 with back-to-back losses from Southern Miss and Arkansas?

Wow. But let's hold on for a moment. Yeah, Lou Holtz is a good coach. Yeah, Alabama has stunk worse than a Birmingham pigsty in the summer. But there is also something to be said for talent. Freddie Milons will put the cocks in their place as an angry Tide puts Holtz's undefeated season six feet under.

Crimson Tide 45, Gamecocks 17

#6 Washington @ #25 Oregon
I am not going to lie to you—I am a huge fan of Huskies quarterback Marques Tuiasosopo. This guy can do everything, and has against some quality football teams. He can beat you with the run, or with the pass as he did against Miami and Colorado.

Oregon, on the other hand, stunned an overrated UCLA team in Eugene last weekend and held the Bruins to negative nine yards rushing. They have one of the best defenses in the nation, and their only loss is to Wisconsin on the road. This is shaping up to be a phenomenal game. But I have to go with the Huskies and their do-anything quarterback. I picked against them in the Miami game, and I am not going to make that mistake again.

Huskies 17, Ducks 13

Upset of the Week:
#3 Florida @ Mississippi State
Was anyone watching the Tennessee game? If a "drop" means "catch" than I guess Florida did "win" the game. The Gators are not the number three team in the country; they have a porous defense and a suspect running game.

They gave up 504 yards to a Couch-less Kentucky!

The only thing they have had going for them this season has been forcing turnovers, as they have a plus-nine turnover ratio. But, just as Michigan and Alabama fell when they were ranked third in the nation so will Florida. This is a gutsy call, but the Gators can't have the ball bounce their way every week. The Bulldogs will take this game in a slop.

Bulldogs 27, Gators 24

Duquesne @ Bucknell

The Bison face their most formidable opponent since Richmond. Duquesne is undefeated this year, rolling off eight straight victories dating back to last season. For the Bison to compete, Lucas Phillips has got to have a breakout day to complement Bucknell's running attack.

Jabu and company will put up a valiant effort, but it won't be enough.

Dukes 24, Bison 17

Last week: I would have run the table had it not been for the blown calls in the Illinois game. Irish fans: I am sorry, but you had to know it was only a matter of time. Penn State fans: find a deep, deep hole and hide until the Iowa game on Nov. 4.

Anyhow, we'll see about this Florida game. Should my prediction hold true, drinks are on me.

Sport's Poetry

The Rocker

By Andrew Burr

Once upon a cold September, came to pass a Great contender,
With a dandy of a fastball and a slider all the More;
For the Braves he did the saving, with these Pitches that were blazing,
While some conflict he was raising, raising like He did before.
Who was raising all this conflict, raising like he Did before?
'Twas the Rocker, nothing more.

In the playoffs he was smashing, while some People he was bashing,
'Cause the New York fans were rowdy and his Mom they called a whore;
So in retaliation, he did state his condemnation Of the people in this nation whose Existence he abhorred.
He insulted all the people in this nation he Abhorred
Quoth the people, "This means war."

"I'm not," said he, "a fan of foreign people in this land, While queers and teenage mothers are Depressing me for sure."
So despite his explanation (which seemed phony And inflated)
It appeared retaliation was what people wanted More.
A punishment for Rocker was what people Did implore Fair and just and nothing more.

His eyes had all the seeming of a bigot that Was dreaming, Making Marge Schott look angelic in her baneful Days of yore;
To a doctor they did send him, in hope that it Would mend him,
But they really should condemn him for the Comments he implored.
The punishment from Selig for the comments he Implored?
Reduced forevermore.

And the Rocker, never flitting, still insisting, still Insisting
That he never meant to damage with those words He did outpour;
But in Sports Illustrated, he so clearly Demonstrated, that he hated when stated All those people he abhorred.
Why did he bash those people who he said he So deplored?
Quoth the Rocker, "I'm not sure."

But the Rocker, sitting lonely in his hometown, Speaking only
To excuse himself for bad things that by pen he Did implore;
And little was he knowing that the Mets' fans would Be throwing everything they would be Owning a little harder than before.
Surely they'll be throwing a little harder than Before
And they shall forevermore.

Picket lines at Turner Field showed int'rest groups Refused to yield,
"We want," they said, "more punishment for Rocker than before."
"Intending for suspending to be pending we are Sending memorandums recommending Fines and penalties galore."
Fines and penalties and other consequences were In store
Quoth the Rocker, "I'll endure."

His behavior so unerving, it had Bush and Bradley swerving,
"It's disgusting," cried the statuesque Vice-President Al Gore;
And Rocker won't be hearing Twisted Sister Or the cheering of the fans whom all are Reeling from the words he did outpour.
Will Rocker ever be respected like he was Before?
Quoth the nation, "Nevermore!"

Loss of Innocence

"How do they do that?" That's the first thing out of my mouth every time I witness an amazing performance in an Olympic event, and it has been for as long as I can remember.

I never actually expect anyone to answer me when I ask this, but I just can't comprehend the level at which Olympic athletes compete, and I can't put into words the incredible talent and strength that is required to be the best in the world.

I said it in 1988, when diver Greg Louganis hit his head on the platform in Seoul and went on to win the gold medal. I said it when the tiny women of the U.S. Women's Gymnastics Team took the gold in Atlanta, and I said it just last week when Ian Thorpe blew everyone away in the 400 freestyle relay in Sydney.

It was the fact that these athletes were human, made out of the very same flesh and blood and elements as myself, that amazed me. The idea that they had trained and honed and sculpted their bodies for years, and had fine-tuned themselves into perfect, medal-winning machines filled me with awe and inspiration.

The Olympics, I had always thought, were one of the most basic and natural human thrills in existence.

Little did I know I was being duped.

This year, it's almost as if the athletes have set up a gigantic scam just so they can sit over in Sydney and laugh at us while we throw our hands up in disbelief at the level of competition. It's not athletes competing and winning medals anymore, it's drugs. And with that recent realization comes what has got to be the lowest point in the history of the Olympic Games.

The unfortunate truth is that this year's Olympics are really no different than past Games, except that now we have better technology and more methods of testing for different kinds of performance-enhancing drugs. Sydney marks the first Games since the formation of the World Anti-Doping Agency (WADA), established in 1999 for the sole purpose of testing, exposing and sanctioning athletes who violate the no-drug policy at the Olympics.

Erythropoietin, or EPO, is WADA's newest target. EPO increases red blood cell production and, thus, endurance. It has been a popular performance-enhancer for endurance and strength athletes for years, but is testable for the first time at the 2000 Games.

Now don't get me wrong: I love the Olympics as much as the next guy, or girl for that matter. I was the kid who made my mom tape every Olympic swimming event while I was away at summer camp, and even this year at school I have been known to quiet an entire party just to make everyone gather around and watch the heroic finish of American swimmer Lenny Kraybill taking the gold.

But with millions of dollars being spent on drug testing by the IOC, millions of dollars being spent on drugs by the athletes and coaches and countless hours spent by all either enforcing or dodging the new drug policies, I can't help but think that it's all a huge waste. With the new EPO test, the buffet of testable substances is growing ever larger. WADA officials everywhere have been claiming for months that the 2000 Games will be the first drug-free Olympics.

Oops.

They were proven wrong before the games even began, when more than 30 pre-Olympic tests came back positive. Compare that to 12 total known drug violations in the entire Atlanta Games, and add the fact that entire teams have pulled themselves out of Sydney Games for fear of getting caught red-handed, and you realize that this year's games are nothing to brag about.

And as if this issue wasn't hot enough, last Friday we reached an all-time low when, for the first time in history, a medal ceremony actually had to be rescheduled because two of the winners had tested positive for a banned form of diuretic. A women's gold medalist and men's bronze medalist in weightlifting were found guilty and stripped of their medals as a glowing WADA rejoiced at their own victory. But the clincher came when IOC Vice President Richard Pound responded to the re-scheduled ceremony by saying, "This is a historic moment."

Historic? Sorry, Dick, but I'll take any record-breaking, jaw-dropping performance of the last hundred years over that shameful scene and call it "historic." Or maybe I'm the only one that doesn't want to highlight the giant game of cops and robbers that the Olympics has become.

I'll admit that the core of the problem is that athletes can't even compete anymore unless they use drugs, and many wouldn't do it if it weren't already the precedent in their sport. With the commercialization of the games, medals are proving to be lucrative investments, not just decorations, and many athletes will risk anything to get the gold.

Unfortunately, the fire is fed by its own fuel, and technology seems to be the real culprit. New forms of drugs and new methods of testing emerge every day, so when will the insanity stop? Not anytime soon, as the IOC is clearly planning to keep this ball rolling.

We've opened Pandora's Box, and now we're in deep. No test is yet available for Human Growth Hormone, one of the most popular bulk-up methods around, and the EPO test is still in its early stages, only good for substances taken within the last few days. Surely more development needs to be done, and with the barely-year-old WADA in full swing, drug testing appears to be the sports world's newest obsession.

The thing that makes me sick is that terms like EPO and blood-doping will soon be household names every four years when the Olympics roll around. Kids will grow up thinking that the heroic athletes they see on TV are simply robots injected with steroids or other drugs, and that their feats are completely unattainable. The sad thing is that they will probably be right.

All of this could have been avoided if athletes and coaches would have taken a realistic look at what sports and winning are all about. No one wants to see a bunch of chemicals competing, and no one should take glory in winning if it was only the drugs that did it. Unfortunately, the hugeness of the games and the insane pressure of competition have taken things to that point.

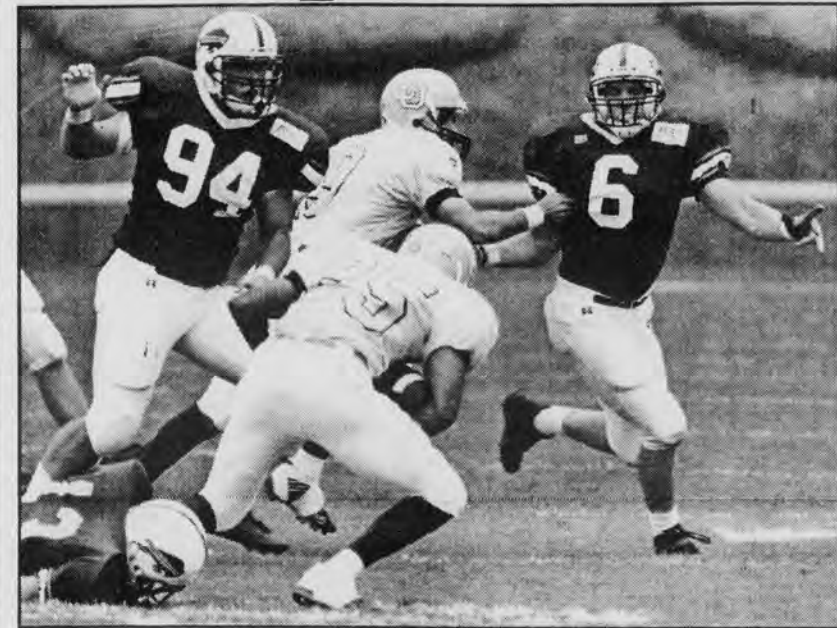

Call me old fashioned, but I just hope that someone will have the vision to slam on the breaks real soon stop this cycle before it destroys athletes as we know them. There are those who say we should just stop the testing and let things take their natural course: sports will simply become a showcase for the best and latest drugs that money can buy. I couldn't disagree more.

When I sit down 15 years from now and hear my kid mutter, "How did he do that?" while watching the Olympics, I want his question to be as rhetorical and innocent as mine was just years ago. If I have to answer, "It's the drugs," then I'd rather just not watch at all.

Bison pull out defensive battle 12-10

Adam Lord '03 (#94) and Dane Helsing '03 (#6) fight through blockers to pursue the Columbia ballcarrier.

By Cory Nadler

The Bison broke an unusual streak this weekend against Columbia University. This was the first game since coach Tom Gadd took over in 1995 that the Bison have won the game after scoring on their first possession. The Bison beat Columbia by a score of 12-10. The Orange and Blue got off to what many would call a good start, when the Columbia Lions went three-and-out on their first drive. On the ensuing drive Lucas Phillips '01 connected with Jim Horan '03 for a 44-pass that brought the Bison inside the Lions' five-yard line. Jabu Powell '02 followed up his record-setting game of a week ago with a one-yard touchdown run to put Bucknell up early in the first quarter. The Bison could not convert on the extra point try, and led 6-0.

After Bucknell's initial burst of offense, both defenses took over the game. Neither team could move the ball successfully for the remainder of the first quarter and much of the second quarter. Midway through the second quarter, Columbia running back Jonathan Reese began to run.

He moved his team down the field, but the Bison defense would not give in, and forced the Lions to settle for a field goal. Both defenses were strong for the remainder of the half, and the Bison went into the half with a slim 6-3 lead.

Early on in the third quarter Columbia took the lead on a 40-yard touchdown run by Reese. The Lions had a fourth down and one from the Bucknell 40-yard line, and Reese was able to break the ball outside and run down the sideline for the score to put his team up 10-6.

Once again the defenses were the strongpoint for the rest of the game. The score remained the same until the very end of the game.

After Kevin Eiben '01 returned a Columbia punt to the 18 yard line, the Bison ended up with a first down and goal on the Columbia eight-yard line.

After throwing two incomplete passes, Phillips hooked up with Horan for the game-winning touchdown pass with 20 seconds remaining. The Bison missed the extra point try once again, but held on to win the game 12-10.

Eiben felt that Horan never should have had to catch the game winning pass. "It should have had a touchdown," he said. But, Eiben was happy to see that his teammates were able to convert on the position that he had set them up with.

Horan's play earned him Player of the Game honors—he had five catches for 81 yards on the day, including his game-winning touchdown catch.

The Bison stayed in this game in large part due to defensive play. Tom Kuhn '01 was a force on the defensive line.

According to Gadd, Kuhn has really improved since last season and is simply "making plays."

Although the Bison only gave up a total of 200 yards, middle-line-backer Vince Ficca '01 was not completely pleased with the play of his defense.

"We have a well balanced defense, but every area can still improve," Ficca said.

Gadd added, "We did not tackle well at the end of the game."

When asked about how he felt about his team's comeback victory, Gadd said, "As long as you have time on the clock, you still have a chance."

The Bison took their chance down to the very end, but were able to pull it out. "This is a game of attitude," Gadd said. And, the Bison kept their winning attitude all the way through the final drive.

Although the Bison have now won two straight games, there are still some things that they need to work on.

"We need to catch the ball," Gadd said.

Although Phillips connected on 12 of his 36 pass attempts, he should have had a much better completion percentage on Saturday, as there were too many dropped balls on well-thrown passes.

Many teams are likely to try to bottle up Powell, so the Bison need to show that they have a passing attack. Powell was still able to run for 119 yards on 29 carries on Saturday, but the Bison cannot count on such a performance every week.

Another thing that the Bison desperately need to sort out is their kicking situation. Bucknell is losing countless points every game because of missed field goals and extra points. This is one aspect of the game that could come back to haunt the Bison later in the season.

Something else that immediately worry is the sudden lack of players

Bison fall short of league power Colgate

Defender Abbey Seaboyer '04 clears the ball.

The Bucknell women's soccer team lost to Colgate on Friday by a score of 6-1. Colgate has won nine out of the last 10 Patriot League titles, and the Bison knew they were in for a challenge.

"In reality, they were a better team this year than I have ever seen them," Bison head coach Chrissy Findlay said.

The loss ended the Orange and Blue's five-game winning streak and dropped their record to 5-3. Although the Bison outshot Colgate 22-19, they could not capitalize on their offensive opportunities.

In the first half of play, Colgate tallied three goals while Bucknell remained scoreless. The Bison defense was confused and disorganized. They used a zone scheme, but the support within the zone was lacking.

Bucknell adjusted over halftime and played a much more competitive second half. "In the second half we definitely stepped it up," said tri-captain Anna Hall '02.

The Bucknell offense cranked out shot after shot with disappointing results. In the second half alone the Bison hit the crossbar or the post four times.

Tara Uchel '03 sparked the Bison offense late in the game. She wove her way through traffic untouched and shot the ball into the upper right corner of the net. Her effort seemed too little too late, though, as Colgate went on to win 6-1.

"We need to work on finishing our shots," Uchel said.

Colgate played with a strong mentality and proved too much for the Orange and Blue. "They are a 'finishing' team and can score great goals—better than most," Findlay said.

If the Bison give more support in the defensive zone and finish more of their shots, they will beat teams like Colgate.

Findlay was proud of her team's ability to adjust after the half.

"We began to play quicker which forced us to think faster and communicate everywhere," she said. "It was just unfortunate we could only convert one of our shots."

The Bison bounced back with a 2-1, double-overtime win on the road against St. Francis yesterday. Uchel netted the game-winning in the 107th minute, after Savannah Rennels '04 sent the game into overtime with a tally late in the second half.

The 6-3 Bison (2-1 in the Patriot League) will host Towson this Sunday at 1:00 p.m. and Penn this Wednesday at 7:00 p.m.

Volleyball gears up for league play at tournament

By Pat Evans

It was nearly impossible to walk around Bucknell's campus this weekend without stepping on chalk drawings asking for Bison volleyball support.

But the important writing was on the wall. The Orange and Blue felt they would surely turn their season around this weekend in the Bucknell Volleyball Subway Classic, and did with a 2-1 performance. "A lot of the pieces of the puzzle came together this weekend," said coach Cindy Opalski. "We got a good concept of what our team could be."

The Bison handily defeated Marist 3-0 on Friday (15-8, 15-5, 15-2). In Saturday's first match Bucknell took care of Canisius in another sweep (15-5, 15-11, 15-11). Villanova proved to be more of a challenge as the Orange and Blue fell, 3-1 (15-13, 14-16, 15-4, 15-5).

The Bison dominated Marist, holding their opponents to just 15 total points. Nicole LaMothe '01 recorded four aces and 11 digs in the match, and setter Whitney Williams '02 had 20 assists.

Canisius, whom the Bison had defeated earlier in the season, was also no match for Bucknell, as the Bison won every set.

Shannon Walker '02 recorded 12 kills with a 33 percent hitting average. Once again, Williams played brilliantly, recording an impressive 31 assists in the match.

Williams and co-captain Brooke Bader '01 played well throughout the weekend and were selected for the All-Tournament Team. Her performance also earned her the honor of the Patriot League Offensive Player of the Week.

"I thought we came together and had fun," said Williams of the team's play.

Villanova ended up winning the tournament but was tested by the Bison, as the teams split the tightly-contested opening two sets. The Wildcats then ran away with the final two sets, 15-4 and 15-5, to claim the victory.

Jen Wrigley '02 played particularly well throughout the weekend, but had her best match against Villanova. She recorded 15 kills and 36 set assists in the match against the formidable Wildcats and picked up 36 digs on defense.

"I felt really good about our team's improvement," said Wrigley, who looks forward to league play.

While Bucknell's standout players led the Bison, it was the total team effort that sparked the wins. Players in supporting roles were crucial in every match. Angela Gano '02 and co-captain Nicole LaMothe '01, with their fine defensive play, were significant contributors to Bucknell's turnaround.

The Bison improved their record to 4-11, and are confident about how they've prepared for their first league game against Navy this Friday. "This is the beginning of our second season," Opalski said. "The slate is clean, and we've learned a lot of lessons from the first third of our season."

E-Leaders to bring dot-com smarts

Big wigs from top dot com companies will be on campus Oct. 12-13 for the first two-day symposium addressing careers in the New Economy. E-Leaders@Bucknell will feature speakers and discussion panels comprised of alumni, parents and professors who are in the forefront of the competitive new versity, Andersen Consulting and General Electric, the symposium has also received support and participation from Ray Metz, associate vice president for information services, Genie Gerdes, interim vice president for academic affairs, Laura Denbow, director of the career development center and a host of faculty, administrators and students from departments across campus.

John Mosser of University Relations originally proposed the e-leaders@Bucknell symposium and was the driving force behind bringing the program to the University.

"It will be a dynamic gathering of alumni, parents, students, faculty and staff to discuss and explore what Bucknellians are doing in the world of e-commerce," Mosser said.

According to the coordinator of the e-leaders@Bucknell symposium Scott Rosevear of University Relations, students want critical information on establishing themselves as leaders in this New Economy.

"Our students are starved for information about careers in the dot com world. We are interested in bringing Bucknell alumni who are leaders in that world to offer insight about getting into a career in the New Economy," Rosevear said.

Officially sponsored by the University, President Steffen H. Rogers, too, has been a key supporter of the symposium and views it as an essential event for all students wishing to learn more about careers in the new digital economy.

"Bucknell students and faculty are actively engaged in studying e-commerce and its growing impact on society. The Internet is already shaping how teaching is accomplished at the University and is fueling the entrepreneurial spirit of many current students," Rogers said.

Rogers is excited with the response from parents and alumni to participate in the event.

"Our alumni and parents are very well represented in the world of e-commerce. The program will include dynamic speakers and informative panel discussions," Rogers said.

Planning for the event began in May 2000. In July, Rosevear successfully arranged for five high-profile

FOX TV anchor to host Midnight Mania

Brian Kilmadee, host of "Fox & Friends" on the FOX News Channel every morning, will serve as the emcee of this year's third annual Midnight Mania.

Not only will the non-alcoholic event traditionally introduce the men and women's basketball season, but there will also be competitions for many notable prizes.

"We are fortunate to have Brian Kilmadee come to Bucknell," said Kathy Arnett, assistant director of campus activities and programs. "He's very spontaneous; his sense of humor and quick wit will keep the crowd pumped up and entertained."

"I'm excited that we can attract a host from a national television program," said Roy Baker, associate dean of Greek life who suggested the idea of bringing Kilmadee to the University. "For the past couple years, we've tried to attract 'big names' but we never could afford them."

"He can ad lib pretty well, he's young, he's got a great sense of humor and I think he'll have a great time [hosting the event]," Baker said.

At approximately 8:30 p.m. on Fri. Oct. 13, the event being held in Davis Gym will start with a three-on-three basketball tournament.

Perhaps on "Friday the 13th" someone could become the lucky winner of a $10,000 cash prize awarded to the person that makes a 3/4-court basket.

In addition, there will be competitions for CD burners, DVD players, cash prizes and much more. Last year's event drew over 1200 students.

"We hope to have Davis Gym packed this year," Arnett said. "Standing room only!"

Throughout the night, there will be free food served by Dining Services, free beverages provided by Coca-Cola and music entertainment featuring DJ James. Around 11 p.m., Emcee Kilmadee will host the rendezvous of competitions.

"We'll start out with the chance to win $1,500 [with someone completing a 1/2-court shot] and we'll grow from there to end the night with the chance for someone to win $10,000," Arnett said.

Midnight Mania will also showcase the talents of several groups on campus, including the Cheerleaders, the Bucknell Dance Team, the Pep Band and, of course, the men and women's basketball teams.

While the central focus of the event will be centered around introducing the basketball teams, there will be competitions to keep the crowd on their toes.

Competitions featured in Midnight Mania will include a pie-eating contest, the "Commerford crawl," a "hoshot" contest and a relay.

Other prizes that will be awarded are: a $150 bookstore gift certificate, $150 (in quarters) towards Laundry, gift certificates from Lewisburg area establishments and Bucknell basketball tickets.

The night will conclude with the chance of someone shooting for the $10,000 prize at approximately 1 a.m.

The event is aimed to become a new of the Bucknell tradition, while bringing a sense of school spirit to the campus community.

Midnight Mania is being sponsored by the office of activities and campus programs, office of deans of students, the athletic department and dining services.

Brian Kilmadee, host of "Fox & Friends," will serve as the emcee of this year's Midnight Mania.

Students march for women's rights

By Katie Marston

Are you interested in fighting for women's rights? The Organization for Women is holding the World March of Women 2000 in Washington D.C.

On Sunday, Oct. 15, a delegation of University students is planning to participate in this global demonstration to raise awareness of women's concerns.

The mission of this worldwide action is to "demand an end to poverty and violence against women and men as we march into the new millennium."

Thousands of organizations in more than 155 countries are joining to unite women around the world to demand that the leaders of the United States, the United Nations and its member States, and other powerful instien's rights are up for grabs in 2000.

All three branches of government—the White House, the Congress and the Supreme Court—hang in the balance of elections.

Never before has the need for a national, feminist march been more apparent, more necessary.

The march in D.C. will address political issues, such as the need for improved funding of violence and poverty prevention programs.

There will be campaigning for the funding of breast and cervical cancer research, mammograms, family planning for poor women and programs to implement Violence Against Women Act.

Petitions will be available for people to sign and support and intensify political pressure.

These exclamations for help will be delivered on Oct. 17 to His Excellency Kofi Annan, Secretary General of the United Nations.

At 7 a.m. on Oct. 15, the bus for the World March of Women 2000 will depart for Washington, D.C. from the corner of 7th Street and Moore Avenue. There will be sign-ups in the LC Mall on Oct. 3.

All students are strongly encouraged to join the march, as the University's active participation in this fight for women will greatly add to this global campaign.

Football losses overstated

Inquirer lists two million, mostly from financial aid

By Andrew Burr

It wasn't a large list, by any means, but somehow it still seemed to be more conspicuous than anything else on the page.

It was inevitable too, this list, considering the content that surrounded it. In every story about a winner, there is a loser. This story, two full pages long, was about the financial triumphs of the Penn State football program.

15.6 million dollars, The Philadelphia Inquirer said, was the revenue Penn State made from its football program in 1999. One list showed the top ten college football profiteers in the nation that year, with Penn State falling somewhere in the middle of the pack.

Another list, constructed only by a few forlorn paragraphs at the end of the article, showed a different story. Placed (by no mistake) directly under the ten biggest profiteers, were the ten schools in the nation that lost the most money on college football that year.

For what it's worth, Bucknell almost avoided the list. Eight schools out of 10 received "higher honors," if that can be said with a straight face. But with losses, according to the paper, totaling some two million dollars, Bucknell seemed like just like every school on that list—a financial loser.

Or that's what the paper implies anyway. That the schools listed—Colgate, Hofstra, Holy Cross, Lafayette, Lehigh, Rice, the University of Connecticut, the University of Akron, Villanova and Bucknell—are carelessly shoveling money into their football programs when the money could be going elsewhere.

That's very much the story that many readers gathered from the list. See REPORT, page 11

CROP Walk to fight world hunger

By Laura Day

For many of us, a full stomach and a hearty meal are too frequently taken for granted. There are thousands of people in the world who go to bed hungry every night. In two weeks you can do something about this situation.

Taking place on Oct. 15, the Lewisburg CROP Walk is a 10k "walk to fight hunger." The CROP Walk supports Church World Service, the global disaster and hunger relief agency of the National Council of Churches.

All participants solicit pledges from friends and neighbors to support their effort. Last year, the Lewisburg CROP Walk raised $9,270 for the Church World Service. According to national CROP Walk statistics, the two and a half million walkers and sponsors who take part each year "represent a vivid slice of Americana."

Walkers come from churches, synagogues, and mosques. They come from businesses, industries, schools, neighborhoods, and service clubs.

"The Lewisburg CROP Walk is a great event," University Chaplain Ian Oliver said. Oliver has been instrumental in the organization of the CROP Walk and in incorporating Bucknell students' participation.

BUSINESS & POLITICS

Pennsylvania key in November

By Josh Guyan

Pennsylvania will be one of the critical battlegrounds of this year's election; with its 23 electoral votes and a history of deciding elections, the Keystone State will be a major target of both major candidates.

California and New York are the large states that tend Democratic and are considered essential for Vice President Gore. By contrast the large for Reagan in the 1980s.

According to James O'Toole of the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, "Both major parties identify the Keystone State as one of a handful of the most competitive and decisive battlegrounds in the fall campaign."

O'Toole also says this is supported by the fact that the state's television markets have received more campaign advertising than any other state. A study by New York University's Brennan Center for Justice and the University of Wisconsin puts the total spent in Pennsylvania at $14.1 million. Next was Ohio with $10.6 million and then Florida with $9.4 million.

Pennsylvania has a popular Republican governor (Tom Ridge) and Republicans Arlen Specter and Rick Santorum hold its Senate seats. Santorum is up for re-election this term, and holds a steady 53 percent to 45 percent lead over his challenger, Rep. Ron Kluge.

The state Senate is firmly in Republican control, but they could easily lose control of the state House. The Republicans hold only a one-seat majority after the resignations of three members who were convicted of or pleaded guilty to crimes.

In the most recent CNN Inside Politics poll, Gore holds a significant lead over Bush, 49 percent to 37 percent.

Consistent with national trends there is a significant gender gap. The vice president leads among women 51 percent to 35 percent and Governor Bush leads among men 48 percent to 40 percent.

Breaking down the issues, Gore leads with those issues considered most important to voters, which are the economy, health care, and education. Gore leads on the economy 49 percent to 41 percent, improvement of schools 45 percent to 40 percent, maintaining soundness of Social Security and Medicare 46 percent to 37 percent.

health care 45 percent to 38 percent, and providing prescription drugs 47 percent to 38 percent.

Bush leads on cutting taxes and prudently using the federal budget surplus, 45 percent to 38 percent. He also holds a lead on character issues. Pennsylvania voters see Bush as the trustworthier candidate by a margin of 49 percent to 38 percent. They also see him as the candidate more likely to encourage high moral standards and values, 47 percent to 38 percent.

What does all this mean? Bucknell Professor of Political Science Burt Levine says this breakdown could favor Gore if we are to trust what the voters say are the most important issues to them. The issue of the economy should favor Gore and issues such as Social Security, Medicare, education, health care, and prescription drugs historically tend to favor Democrats. This recent poll would suggest that this historical trend rings true.

"Bush has chosen to fight this election on Democratic turf and as we know teams tend to do less well on the visiting field than on their home turf," Levine noted. However, Levine also alludes to another factor that could affect the election or the "ground war"—Get-out-the-vote operations could be essential to winning Pennsylvania.

Alan Novak, the Republican state party chairman also stresses the importance of organization. "In a classic swing state like Pennsylvania, in a close election, it's often going to be the volunteer activity that generates the extra votes that provide the margin of victory."

The Republicans are considered to have a better statewide organization due partially to Governor Ridge, but a strong union organization will aid the Democrats, says Peter O'Toole of the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette. The Philadelphia Inquirer says the Lehigh Valley and "pro-choice" areas of the Philadelphia suburbs could decide the election just as they did in 1992 and 1996.

Whatever the outcome, Pennsylvania will be one of a handful of key battleground states that will decide the election. Pennsylvania residents should take their decision seriously upon entering the polls on Nov. 7.

Debate fails to live up to hype

By Tim Scheu

The temperature was 65 degrees, the podiums were 48 inches high and Ralph Nader was forcibly removed from the premises.

After weeks of arguing over the most minor of details, Vice President Al Gore and Governor George W. Bush took their place before Jim Lehrer and a University of Massachusetts audience for the first of three presidential debates.

Fittingly, the bickering didn't end with the debate format. "If there was any sense that these candidates were above the interruptive nature and name-calling of lesser debates, those notions were put to rest. From the outset, Bush accused Gore of quoting 'fuzzy numbers' and running a campaign based upon 'Mediscare.' Meanwhile, Gore continuously interrupted Lehrer and his Republican opponent in attempt to get the last word."

Overall though, the debate belonged to Vice President Gore. While Bush fumbled with his words and was constantly on the defensive, Gore patiently laid out his plan for a better America. He once again proclaimed "I am my own man," thereby distancing himself from President Clinton.

Perhaps the most dramatic moment of the debate centered around the discussion on abortion. When asked if he would appoint pro-life justices to the Supreme Court, Bush responded by saying only that he would appoint candidates that held a "strict constructionist" view.

Gore countered by saying that such words were merely a code for Republican justices.

Then, in an apparent fit of frustration, Bush lashed out at Gore, saying his opponent would only appoint "liberal, activist judges who will use their bench to subvert the legislature."

This was only one of many contentious issues. Throughout the debate, Bush focused on Gore's willingness to expand an already bloated government bureaucracy. "His (Gore's) plan is to empower Washington. Mine is to empower the American."

Bush prided himself on the fact that he was not from the district, repeatedly saying, "I am not from Washington, I am from Texas." He emphasized that he was not a man limited by his party, emphasizing his ability to "forge the partisan divide."

Gore, on the other hand, attacked Bush for his policy on cutting taxes. Citing a variety of statistics, he attempted to demonstrate that Bush was merely trying to appease the wealthiest of Americans. The hallmark of his argument was: "For every dollar I spend on education, Governor Bush wants to give five dollars back to the wealthiest one percent of America."

Overall, the debate lacked the fireworks that many had expected. Bush did not fair as badly as some had anticipated, and his syntax and grammar were relatively coherent. Gore did not really attack Bush's plan and failed to take advantage of his superior debating skills.

Though it was billed as a "make or break" moment in the campaign, it is doubtful that last night's performance will have a significant effect on those undecided voters. Though the two candidates displayed their differences on a few key issues, their responses were often so bogged down with details they failed to make contact with voters. Especially concerning the Medicare issue, the candidates attacked portions of their opponent's plan by taking them out of context. There was the sense that neither candidate truly understood what the other was attempting to do, and there was no attempt to clarify it for the viewer.

There are three more debates that could potentially decide the race for president. There is a vice presidential debate tonight, a roundtable discussion next week, and a "town hall" debate in two weeks. Political insiders say the latter will favor Bush, but if there is anything that can be learned from past presidential debates, it is that politics has never lent itself to predictability.

Supreme Court embarks on groundbreaking term

By Michael Boland

The United States Supreme Court opened its 2000-2001 term on Monday. The cases the Court will hear are strikingly dissimilar to those from the previous term. The 1999-2000 term, which ended in June, was full of controversial cases. It asserted the Boy Scouts' right as a private organization to define its membership criteria, while striking down state-level prohibitions of partial-birth abortion and student-led prayer at football games. This year's comparatively low-key docket, while not yet full, gives the impression that after such a tumultuous '99 term, the Court is looking for a breather.

Here is a preview of some of the flashier legal issues the Court will tackle in the coming months:

Clean air—good or bad?
Well, not exactly. But the most sweeping provisions of the Clean Air Act (CAA) of 1990 are being challenged in Court, on constitutional grounds. Is the migration of birds part of any "interstate commerce" which falls under Congress' constitutional jurisdiction? Congress thinks so; business leaders, hampered by the CAA, do not. They argue that migratory birds have nothing to do with interstate commerce. Congressional and EPA regulation, then, would be an invalid application of the Commerce Clause, and key portions of the CAA would be unconstitutional. The Rehnquist Court has made several recent decisions narrowing Congress' power under the Commerce Clause, and this case will have implications greater than those of simply the Clean Air Act. It may give a clue as to how long of a leash the Court will grant Congress in future Commerce Clause legislation. To further restrict Congress in this regard would, on one hand, return more power to states, generally a politically popular goal. On the other hand, it would jeopardize the constitutional grounding of major legislation such as the Civil Rights Act of 1964 which, given the benefit of the doubt, has nationalized policy in areas that are almost-but-not-quite "commerce."

Pro golfer Casey Martin has a painful, medically recognized leg ailment that makes it very difficult for him to walk long distances. He successfully sued the PGA under the Americans with Disabilities Act, forcing the organization to allow him to use a golf cart when he competes. The PGA has appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that nothing in the ADA requires a governing body of a competitive sport to change the rules for one contestant so that the competition is easier for him. To do so, the PGA argues, would give Martin an unacceptable advantage over his fellow golfers, who must as part of the game, deal with the fatigue that walking generates.

The Fourth amendment's guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures will come under intense scrutiny, with not one but two important cases to be decided. One case is coming out of Indianapolis, where the Court will examine the police practice of setting up random roadblocks to check suspicious cars with drug-sniffing dogs. The Court has also agreed to hear a challenge to a marijuana arrest triggered by police use of heat-seeking goggles. The sensors allowed police in Portland, Ore. to detect unusual amounts of ultraviolet heat coming from a suspect's home, giving them the probable cause they needed to obtain a search warrant and ultimately make an arrest. The Court will rule whether or not the police needed a search warrant to use the goggles to begin with, and by so doing, will address the relationship of the Fourth Amendment to technologically advanced, non-intrusive search methods.

These issues may not elicit as strong emotions as abortion or gay rights, but the constitutional issues involved are still important. For the next eight months, the political world will focus on the Supreme Court, as this powerful body defines the nature and the scope of some of the Constitution's most fundamental powers, principles and rights.

Entertainment industry facing government charges

By Melissa Finklestein

In an industry that draws 31% of its total ticket sales from consumers ages 12 to 20, marketing that appeals to this constituency has a lot at stake. According to the LA Times, the U.S. Senate has charged film and video game makers with taking their advertising too far, targeting youth with violence and sex. In fact, elementary school kids have been used in focus groups testing commercials for movies such as "I Know What You Did Last Summer," a movie that centers on gory themes. The line is thin between censorship and regulation, and while studio executives have pledged a genuine interest in curbing their marketing strategies, one question remains: how involved can the government become in this arena?

One argument is that parents should be the true regulators of what their children do and do not view. However, exposure to advertising for violent films is inevitable. It was only after a hearing that Walt Disney Co. pledged to remove ads for R-rated movies from its ABC network during child-viewing hours. Advocates for regulation like Sen. John McCain have proposed a universal system attuning the different ratings seen on television programs, films and video games. McCain told an LA Times reporter, "Some segments of the industry have made more progress than others. The [Federal Trade Commission] will continue monitoring what goes on..." The future of your business lies in your hands.

There is no doubt that recent violence in schools, specifically the Columbine High School tragedy, has prompted government officials to address the issue of violence in the media, and children's exposure to it. It seems we are yet again being faced with the dilemma of whether violence in the media creates violence in our society, or if it is simply a reflection of life.

Either way, the government's involvement in the issue of violence in film is unprecedented. Not since 1955 when James Dean's "Rebel Without a Cause" was suspected of encouraging juvenile delinquency has the Senate summoned studio executives to Washington.

Prior to 1955, the only other cases were in 1941 when the Senate Foreign Relations Committee accused film executives of propagandizing war, and in 1947, when the Red Scare was manifested through the insinuation that communist overtones could be detected in films.

With these instances considered, it seems that media resonates with the problems facing society. Violence most certainly is a pressing issue in the year 2000, rising to the top of the government agenda. Especially since it is an election year, the issue of children being targeted in advertising campaigns for violent films will be in the news for quite some time.

Al Gore indicated that he would propose legislation if Hollywood fails to self-regulate their industry. Sen. Joseph Lieberman expressed his skepticism while campaigning in Wisconsin. "They haven't really said they'd stop it."

George W. Bush asserts similar sentiments, as both candidates structure their campaigns around issues that affect the family.

In a survey conducted by Times Poll, three-fifths of adults who are not parents stated that they were more concerned about excessive government controls, while a majority of parents expressed their uneasiness about excessive violence in films. Clearly, there is a division on the issue, and it will take time before we see how it is resolved.

Students and community members alike participated in the "Stop the Hate" March and Vigil against hate crimes Monday night. The march ended at Hufnagle Park in downtown Lewisburg where a vigil concluded the night.

Lectures successful, but still lacking

When the University announced Robert Pinsky's visit to campus, too many people asked "Who?" Pinsky, the former national poet laureate, is one of many prominent national figures the University has brought to speak to the student body. Although speeches by Morris Dees, Jane Goodall, Floyd Cochran and Danny Glover and Felix Justice resulted in success, many others seem like they don't even take place.

If you're an avid reader of What's Happening or Notes & Notices, you may catch some of the other lecture offerings scheduled around campus. If you're not, however, you'll probably never hear about them. Departmentally-sponsored lectures barely ever get any publicity, let alone the futile student-wide email or posted fliers in classroom buildings.

And people wonder why no one attends. Next spring the senior class will vote on its choice for commencement speaker, a selection process that has drawn harsh criticism in the past few years. Nostalgic future grads always rally for a memorable speaker. Yet students neglect the stream of those memorable speakers that visit the University each year.

The Bucknellian does accept some fault for this; for years, we have covered top-bill speakers and given considerable coverage for concerts. We have not, however, given sufficient coverage to these smaller lectures. Often we will preview an upcoming lecture, but find the prospect of a story loses its shine when no one shows up for it.

If 10 students attend a particular lecture, it's simply not "news." If students and community members pack the L2 Forum or the Weis Center, we are obligated to provide substantial coverage.

But the fact is that doesn't happen very often. The various lecture offerings are a clear reflection of the faculty and administration's dedication to the University's academic mission, and we applaud them for their efforts. We do hope, however, that some new initiatives are undertaken to increase student interest.

No matter how much effort goes into their planning, offerings like European Identities or Physics Coffee Talks, for example, will never be a success with a majority of students. Lectures like these may draw a crowd of their respective majors, but they don't appeal to students outside the discipline.

"The Bucknell Bubble" has become a well-known cliché at the University, and yet many efforts made to abolish this separation from the outside world are neglected. Perhaps if faculty and administration look more closely at broader student interest in determining speakers, students will take advantage of these opportunities in the future.

Bucknellian editors respond to censorship accusations

Last Friday, Alex Monticello '01 launched a propaganda campaign against The Bucknellian, accusing the editors of omitting the above article last week as an act of censorship. As the editors-in-chief of The Bucknellian, we would like to clarify what was simply a grave misunderstanding.

The Bucknellian's staff works on a rigorous editorial schedule from week to week, complete with clearly designated deadlines. Mr. Monticello submitted the above piece, labeled as "BSG Phone Home - Editorial" to The Bucknellian email account late last Tuesday night. The editors received this piece and quickly decided that it would not run because it has exceeded our diagnosed deadline for opinions articles.

Furthermore, because it was labeled as an editorial, we believed he wanted it printed as an op-ed piece. After further clarification, we learned that the piece was intended as a letter to the editor, but because it was not submitted in the proper format, the editors-in-chief, in cooperation with the opinions editors, decided not to print the piece.

Over ten emails from various students followed Mr. Monticello's submission, insisting that The Bucknellian print the story.

Mr. Monticello sent an email to the editors Thursday night asking why the piece had not been run. A reply was Voter registration sparks controversy

Dear Editor,

I write in a state of much confusion and questioning. Several weeks ago, I and four other students launched a campus-wide voter registration drive.

After working together as a small group, we saw the need to look to our student leaders on this campus to advance our efforts. We concluded that we needed to look no further than our leaders of the Bucknell Student Government.

Logically we felt that an initiative concerning increased involvement in national politics would be of particular interest to our political leaders. Clearly this could be seen, as an opportunity for our Student Government to undertake an ambition whose impact would reach beyond the walls of our dormitories.

Registering to vote will effect students for a lifetime. Unlike the issues of change machines, vending machines, or washing machines, voting is something that concerns us all as citizens.

Dismissing the myth that your vote doesn't count, it is the most fundamental form of civic participation in a democracy. If nothing else, it is the one right that all 150 million eligible voters can exercise to express their views and opinions.

But how then could our Bucknell Student Government reply so apathetically? Is it that they don't have an interest in our student population? Are they not concerned with politically involving all 3600 students on this campus? Do they merely operate in a vacuum far from the reach or contact of our student body? What is their function as so called "student government leaders" anyway? And are they members to simply capitalize on the resume space? What is it that Bucknell Student Government intends to accomplish through their efforts?

As far as I can see, it certainly isn't engaging the rest of our student population. In this way, they certainly do not express a desire to carry us in any direction. So whom in leadership's name are they leading?

For the record I'd like to make it clear that we as committed group of five individuals managed to register over 400 students this month. And our Student Government leaders, making up a collective body of more than 40, failed to even return one completed registration form. This is simply inexcusable on the part of our political leaders.

So I challenge you all who consider yourselves apart of this government, to take leadership. Be not afraid to embark on a project that has much validity. Do not cover behind the grand shadow of your position, but rather fulfill it.

My challenge stands then for you all to match our personal efforts of 400 registered students. Executive Board, if it has to fall on anyone's shoulders it must be yours.

So please feel personally responsible for your government's failure, and now make amends. The deadline for voter registration is Oct. 10, please do not delay any longer.

Thank You,
Alexander Monticello

Dear Editor,

I am writing in response to the allegations made against the Bucknell Student Government in the "Anti-Press" written by Alexander Monticello. I must admit, that I and the other members of BSG were taken back by the article written.

Rather than focusing his thoughts on the importance of voter registration, Mr. Monticello passed judgement on a group of people in a negative manner without supporting evidence. We find that, although it is one's right to express his/her opinion against BSG, it must be done so in a matter based on factual information. This article, on the contrary, is based on lack of information, miscommunication and what appears to be frustration.

When the Progressive Alliance group approached BSG (approximately three weeks ago), we allowed them to speak, considering it was an unofficial meeting without our elected First Year members. We found their cause to be a worthy one and gave them our approval and our verbal support of their endeavor.

However, as the governing body of the students, we cannot promote any organization by taking a hands-on role. If we were to do this, every organization would expect the same response.

For these reasons, we have given and continue to give our support to organizations while remaining unbiased. Alex Monticello finds us to be apathetic. To say that members of the student government are apathetic is a fallacy, and, for myself, slanderous.

As President of BSG, I cannot mandate the student government members to get people to vote. We are the governance of the student body. Political activism is not our mission.

Our responsibility is to meet the needs of the students and to guarantee that they receive fair and equal representation at Bucknell University.

By being angry, Mr. Monticello is not enticing people to hear his message. The issue is not about BSG and what our purpose is. Allow me to redirect this frustration towards the real issue: voter registration.

The members of BSG find that voter registration is a vital issue that we cannot ignore. It is unfair to make accusations stating that by not registering people to vote is our "government's failure." Just as it is not forced by our national government for us to vote, we cannot force anyone to do the same.

Voting is a personal issue and not one in which you can coax people into choosing. When I was first approached by this organization I was not asked if I was registered to vote, but I was told I needed to register. Please, have a little more faith in our student body. I know I do.

For the record, I am registered to vote, and I, along with many other students want to remain registered in our districts, and not in Lewisburg. Is this apathy? No, rather we are creating our own path rather than being told which one to follow. This is the direction in which I want to lead our student body.

Despite the negative feedback we have received from Mr. Monticello, BSG continues to support his Voter Registration Drive.

In closing, I urge Mr. Monticello to focus on the purpose of his organization and in achieving his goals, not on what he feels that BSG has not done.

Yours truly,
Marsha Lee Lewis

What island? Survive "the bubble!"

By Kristen Jancuk

If you're reading this, it probably means you have survived the first half of this semester with at least one of your academic skills, literacy, still intact and you haven't starved to death. Your parents would be proud.

And fall break, if you can call it a break since you spend more time in your car or a plane trying to get home than actually in your house, is the perfect opportunity to prove to your parents once again that you really can make it on your own. Last year wasn't just a fluke. I encourage everyone to share with their parents the survival skills Bucknell has forced us to develop.

Surviving the long winter months up here in the chilly mountainous Lewisburg region can prove difficult, especially with the less than satisfactory clothing options at the Susquehanna mall. Fortunately, Bucknell students have successfully coped with the discovery of the J. Crew catalog, whereby all students can be warm and cozy in overpriced sweaters.

Those who just can't stomach J. Crew have discovered the never-ending supply of Bucknell jackets, sweatshirts and pants in the bookstore to keep them from freezing to death on the long walks between classes.

Food is another story. While we don't have to struggle to find something to eat, we do have to search for something edible. The food here starts out fairly well but after about three straight weeks of bagels and burritos, something has to change. Fortunately, we can make almost anything a meal. Always have milk, preferably fresh, and any sort of packaged pasta in your room at all times. You never know when it might be too cold to trek to the LC.

Remember that mixing things up a little makes a huge difference. Hence, pizza for breakfast and cereal for dinner. We've also discovered that the calorie content of beer pretty much negates any need to eat during the weekend. Look, mom and dad, we're saving money!

As a freshman, I never thought about the dangers nature poses to students until a bat invaded my dorm room one night. Fortunately, he was quickly taken care of, amidst much shrieking and jumping on furniture, using a coffee mug and the outdoor skills of my next door neighbor. Now I've learned to always have a coffee mug and a boy on hand for these and similar emergencies such as gross bugs and overly friendly squirrels with an appetite for leftover macaroni and cheese.

The laundry room brings out the aggressive side in every student, particularly those annoying ones who absolutely cannot wait an extra two minutes for you to remove your clothes from the dryer, dumping them all over the floor instead. A written death threat posted on the front of your machine has been known to deter thieves for at least a minute or two.

However, since the whole ordeal is rather disagreeable, most of us avoid it altogether, finding new ways to recycle our clothes. Jeans can be worn an almost infinite number of times until they're completely lost their shape. I've also noticed that most students change their clothes about 20 times a day, which I've decided is a means to prevent any of their clothes from getting "really" dirty, that way they can be worn again.

Perhaps one of our most difficult tasks here in college is class attendance, made all the more difficult when we're up late . . . studying. It can be tough to appear alert and attentive when you've spent half the night pouring over your economics notes.

Baseball caps are always a quick solution, so your professor cannot actually tell if you're sleeping or not. A steady supply of caffeine into your bloodstream also helps and since most of us don't have access to an IV, we've chosen, rather, to keep the Coca-Cola Company in business with our exorbitant daily purchases.

With this quick recap of Bucknell survival skills, I hope I have ensured that all of you will have an appropriate response when your parents ask, "So what have you been learning at school?" You never know, if word gets out maybe this will be the next Survivor locale.

True intellect is ability, not a number

By Allyson Demerath

Intelligent. Clever. Bright. Smart. Gifted. Intellectual. Sharp. Quick. Whatever you want to label it. Most people at Bucknell University have been associated with many of these descriptions. Essentially, they all refer to the same thing: the ability to excel in a given subject, area, or discipline. I would like to argue that each and every person possesses this trait in some way, shape or form.

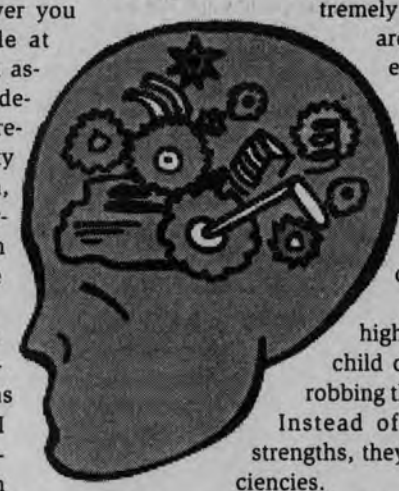

A good friend of mine in high school could do his physics homework in his sleep. I was not so fortunate. Normally, I had to reread the problem seven times before I could even start to try and solve it. Even then, I still didn't understand it. However, this same friend couldn't write an English paper to save his life. I, on the other hand, could write forever. I never did not even know it. They have spent their whole lives trying to please other people and live other's dreams. They were never praised for their own personal strengths, or taught to develop their own dreams. Wouldn't it be more effective to praise that person for what he or she does well? Think of all the people with low self-esteem. Where would they be today if they had been praised instead of criticized? To recognize the gifts and talents within each person is certainly not a difficult task.

Just because someone does not have a stellar GPA or IQ does not mean they should automatically be deemed unintelligent. One cannot measure intelligence by a GPA or worse yet, an income. These are simply numbers, not a definitive representation of intellect.

Granted, they are important numbers; they may dictate where you get a job, what medical school you attend or whether or not you can afford to live comfortably. Still, they are only numbers. True intellect cannot be measured by a number.

While it is important to strive toward self-improvement, it is essential to believe in oneself. Each person is worthy of that belief, and many do

Fighting for the right to let freedom ring

By Matthew Hinson

Freedom of speech, press, religion and assembly—all guaranteed. (among other things) in the United States of America. Yet we seem to be in the midst of an era of change. Our freedoms seem to be challenged wherever we turn, and it is time to make a decision.

Should we trust the wisdom of our founding fathers, who granted us all these freedoms, or should we turn our backs on this because it is not "modern" enough? Our freedom is the most important thing we will ever have and shouldn't be compromised for modernity's sake. In Dec. 1999 and April 2000, protests were staged in Seattle and Washington, D.C. by citizens voicing their opposition to the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the World Trade Organization, groups which they say hurt both the developing and the developed worlds through their policies. Police arrested many of the protesters.

Arresting those who were violent would have been legitimate, but peaceful protest is guaranteed by freedom of assembly, and it seems that some of those arrested were protesting peacefully.

Only a handful of companies control a huge portion of the sources from which we get our news. Disney owns ABC, GE owns NBC, and Viacom owns CBS. Disney also owns many major newspapers. Viacom owns Simon and Schuster publishers; the list goes on.

The point here is that there are really very few voices of the media. Can one really expect ABC to report anything damaging about Disney or GE? Freedom of the press does exist, but through a few small potholes that require you to comply with their standards in order to be heard.

Also, voicing your opinion through the press can be asking for trouble if you speak poorly about the powers that be, namely business and government. These forces can shut you down and revoke your freedom to express yourself by claiming libel or otherwise acting to make certain that your message is not heard.

Freedom of speech is used on a smaller scale, addressing a smaller audience than freedom of the press. This may be the most important freedom, for without this one, the other three would lose meaning.

This one is also the hardest to define, hardest to defend and, it seems, easiest to render impotent. One cannot say anything without the risk that it will offend someone. In our modern society, it seems that freedom of speech is pushed aside in favor of behavior-regulatory speech.

Equality is an ideal we should strive for, but sometimes it seems as though we search not for equality but rather conformity in society.

The point of these freedoms is to allow a diversified society, with different opinions, feelings and points of view. Repressing freedom of speech by claiming that you are not allowed to offend someone when you speak limits our strength as a nation. Obviously we should strive not to judge people, but we should be mature enough as a people to regulate ourselves rather than have our lives regulated for us.

Our forefathers thought that these freedoms had the potential to be dangerous, but also thought that we could handle them maturely. We must not forget that these freedoms were given us for our benefit, and we must not allow them to be taken away.

Finally, it is Bucknell's "business" to be involved in the study abroad process. Since we are awarding Bucknell degrees based on one-eighth to one-quarter of the work done abroad, we have a legitimate interest in ensuring that students participate in academically-sound programs. And while we charge Bucknell tuition for that semester, we do not retain all of that money. We not only pay the tuition costs of each student's program, we also export all institutional financial aid. Were we to deny the latter, we would also deny equal access to this part of our curriculum. While these policies may not be popular, they allow us to offer study abroad opportunities in a way that is both fair to students and to the University.

Israeli-Palestinian violence discouraging

By Gretchen Schrock

After a brief foray into relative peace, the Israeli countryside has returned to a state of war. The match that lit this fire was none other than the right-wing Ariel Sharon who, on Thursday, visited the Muslim religious compound on Harim al-Sharif or as the Jews call it, the Temple Mount, with his nationalist supporters and the deliberate presence of numerous Israeli troops.

Sharon is a former ranking general and defense minister, who is reviled for his role in the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1982 and for his failure to prevent the massacre of hundreds of Palestinians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps. His recent actions sent the message to the Palestinians that not only do the Israelis have the right to visit the holy shrine without permission, but also have a claim to legal sovereignty over the area.

Sharon later tried to appease the Palestinians by saying that any Arab could visit Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial, without permission. Would any Arab see that as an equal bargain-one side visits the holiest site in the world, which both sides claim, and one visits a memorial to the people of the other side and the atrocities committed against them at the hands of the Nazis?

The Palestinians' anger manifested itself in a violent uprising. The Israeli military retaliated with further violence, at one point employing anti-tank rockets, combat helicopters and tanks against the rock-throwing, gun-shooting Palestinians. Does the Israeli response seem a little too aggressive, especially considering that nearly all of the deaths were on the Palestinian side? The Voice of Palestine broadcasted a UN-Hebrew-language appeals at one point to restrain Israeli soldiers, saying "Our babies' blood is as red as your babies'."

The sorrow following the burials fuels another round of violent confrontation between the opposing forces, and the dead become religious and cultural martyrs. The remembrance of lost lives and opportunities makes the hatred burn brighter.

National leaders always blame each other, but never themselves, for the deaths resulting from their inability to find a feasible solution to the violence and strife. The Israeli leadership's position on the issues, war is all that will exist in the future, or violence and death will be the normal state of affairs. Until the generation of some positive changes in the leadership's position on the issues, war is all that will exist in the Hunter's long road to Lewisburg

By Sarah Gudenkoff

Although John Hunter is a very recent addition to the University faculty and English department, he has not had a problem getting into the swing of University life. He is, in fact, quite used to adjusting to new environments.

Hunter, an assistant professor of English, was born in Great Britain, where he lived in a small village for the first 12 years of his life. He then moved to Toronto, Canada. Hunter recalls that the adjustment between living in a small community and living in a large city was difficult for him to make.

Professor Hunter is also not new to living in the United States. He has lived for a total of eight years in various states. Pennsylvania is the most recent state added to a list that also includes New York and North Carolina.

It was during graduate school, at Duke University, that Hunter decided he would love to teach. His first teaching experience convinced him to continue and pursue a career. He said that he loved reading as a child but that his love of literature has less to do with being an English professor than one would think.

"People think you must love reading to be a literature scholar, but you don't—not to be a good one," he said. "That's the funny thing; you have to love thinking. It's not enough to love what you teach; you have to be constantly willing and able to interrogate it and to interrogate your assumptions about it."

For Hunter, English is the most interesting field of study within the Humanities. He said that studying English is the "best possible way to learn how to read the codes that govern our culture." He is interested in questioning the basis of education and literature: "Why is it that we read the classics; why are the classics a good thing?"

When asked about how he came to his decision to study and teach English, Hunter laughed and said, "A lightning bolt certainly did not strike me with inspiration" and that he never suddenly "just knew" what he wanted to do with his life. He said that he was in the same sort of situation but was still unsure of what to do with his life.

In fact, Hunter took time off from school to discover what he wanted to do. During his break he spent six months working in Asia. It was there that he decided to try English. As he put it, "all one can do is try it and see if you like it, and if you do, keep doing it and don't look back."

One of Hunter's main incentives for coming to the University is the fact that his wife, Chislane McDavies, has taught at the University for the past three years, also as an assistant professor in the English department. "That is one of the main reasons that I am really happy here. We no longer have to live apart from each other." The family also includes their eight-month-old son, Sasha.

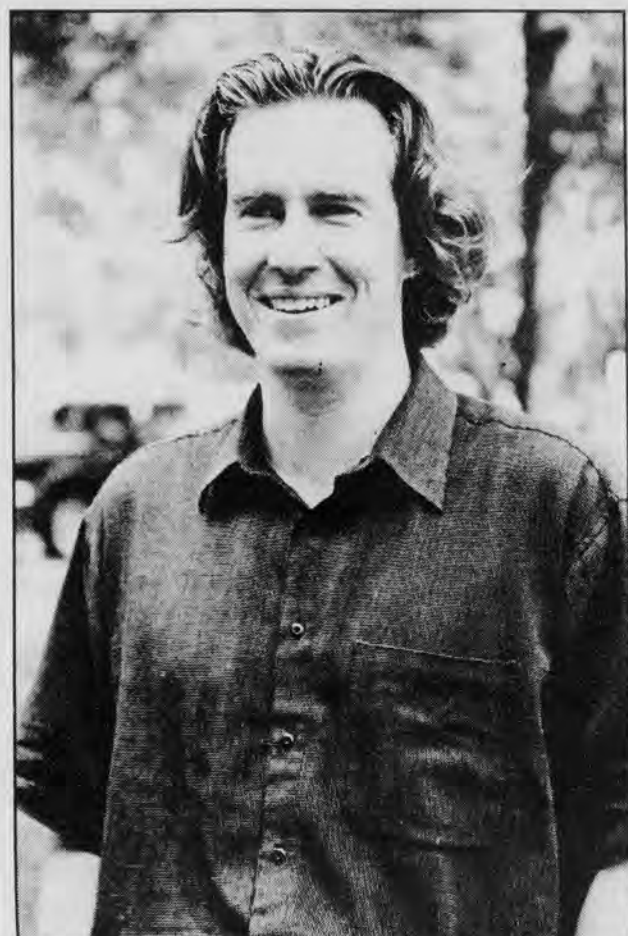

Hunter speaks enthusiastically of both the University and its future. He and his wife would both like to involve themselves in the University's abroad programs, and he wants very much to be involved in the University's goal of redefining itself for the new millennium.

"I want to help examine some of the assumptions that have guided university education over the past century; I am questioning assumptions about what students should learn and need to learn, assumptions that are not a matter of right or wrong, appropriate or inappropriate, outdated or necessary," he said.

"The courses that I teach are good places to examine why we need classic texts. I think there's a tremendous value in teaching them, but that it's the approach that has to be reevaluated," he said.

Hunter sums up his attitude towards education succinctly. "After eight years of teaching at the university level, I've learned that what you teach is less important than how you teach it."

John Hunter recently joined the English Department.

And Hunter teaches according to such principles; his questioning, his open communication and his love for learning—all acquired over years of travel, observation and searching—makes a classroom headed by Hunter one that enriches the minds of his students who, as Hunter once did, struggle to find "what to do" with their lives, and, perhaps more importantly, how to go about doing it.

Wink Thinks

Dear Wink,

Have you ever had someone who just won't leave you alone? You know the type of person who just seems to always be around you, talking to you, following you and trying to hook up with you? A lot of girls throw the term "stalker" around, even though the person is really just a guy looking for a date. However, they like to tell all their friends they have a stalker because having someone following you around is a good thing. I am not going to call this person who is all over me a stalker, she is just that crazy girl who won't leave me alone.

I met this girl at a party one time, and just happened to dance with her because I was trying to be nice. Also, I was trying to get her friend that I was interested in, to notice. I thought I could get on her good side by being nice to the friend who is all over me a stalker, she is just that crazy girl who won't leave me alone. I danced with her and she had a liking to me and doesn't have the self-control to leave me alone. She calls at all hours of the night, even though I told her not to. She "just happens" to be in my room in certain places because she knows my whole schedule.

The girl even had the tendency to walk into my room one day while I was gone, and then proceed to wash and fold it. Most guys I know would be asking, "Will you marry me?" I just don't want some girl I don't know messing up my dirty boxes. Normally I wouldn't talk to the girl and she would leave me alone, but this girl doesn't seem to get it. How do I get her to leave me alone? I have no idea how to talk to this girl to get her to understand. Any suggestions?

Sincerely,
A Wanted Man

Dear A Wanted Man,
Let me first tell you that you made a huge mistake by trying to get with the girl you like by dancing with her friend. It doesn't work! You should have seriously just gone up to the girl you were interested in and started dancing with her. So now you got this freaky girl after you, and she won't leave you alone, huh? It won't be that hard to get rid of her and I will show you how.

You say that she keeps calling you late at night. There is an easy solution. Don't pick up the phone. You have caller ID. Use it! What else do you think it's for? It's a free secretary that screens your calls.

Jackeline Flicker—The Bucknellian

The whole laundry thing is definitely kind of weird I must admit. I have never met a girl who would just walk into my room and do my laundry. I mean who knows what else she did while she was in there, but that's for you to worry about, not me.

If you really want this whole fiasco to end, there are a couple of easy ways to go about it. The first is that you could just talk to the girl and tell her that you aren't interested. Let her know what's going on and how you feel, tell her you have a girlfriend, tell her you are dying, tell her anything, just go about it in a polite manner.

Another way that you could go about it would be to talk to her friend. This would allow you to end things peacefully, and get an in with the girl you really wanted in the first place. Both of these require little effort, but will end your journey.

However, if neither of the first two methods work, drastic measures are in order. All you need to do is confront the person and tell them off. She will definitely get her feelings hurt, but it is the ultimate end all. Let them know you aren't interested in the simplest way you can because that may be what it takes for them to understand. I know it's harsh, but it will definitely work. She may even go off crying, and you will probably lose all chances with that other girl, but hey, at least she won't bother you anymore. That's what you want, isn't it?

If you are interested in writing to Wink there is no need to worry; all questions are confidential and all answers are always thorough. However, you got this freaky girl after you, and she won't leave you alone, huh? It won't be that hard to get rid of her and I will show you how.

You say that she keeps calling you late at night. There is an easy solution. Don't pick up the phone. You have caller ID. Use it! What else do you think it's for? It's a free secretary that screens your calls.

Fair brings thousands to Bloomsburg

By Jolene Hart

All I really hoped for was an afternoon away from work, some interesting sights and a whole lot of cotton candy. The Bloomsburg Fair, then, seemed like the perfect way to spend one of the last warm fall afternoons of the year.

I made the drive to Bloomsburg with a group of friends, and we found the town bustling with people who had traveled to join the occasion. This year's fair marked the 146th annual event for Bloomsburg, though a giant sign that simply read "The Big Pig" soon lured us in.

For 75 cents, we viewed an enormous hog, which was estimated to measure four feet in height and over 1,310 pounds—something you just don't see every day.

Food vendors, however, create the festive atmosphere (and take up the majority of the fairground). It's nearly impossible to ignore the scents of hot apple cider or freshly popped popcorn that permeate the air and tempt your taste buds from the moment you enter the gates.

And with each food item costing between two and five dollars, the fair may be the only place more costly than The Bison. Nevertheless, there are some unique foods that you just can't resist: these range from the traditional ice cream and funnel cakes to more unusual offerings such as pudding in a cone or pumpkin-flavored cotton candy. Once I surveyed the entire scene and decided what to eat first, I realized that I would need to weave my way back to it in the maze of booths and amusement rides.

Although difficult, this proved to be possible. My friends and I began our feast with fried dough, a large funnel cake topped with fruit or chocolate. Caramel apples, strawberry lemonade and milkshakes followed; none of us were disappointed.

The fair breathes life into the phrase "something for everyone." The fair's schedule included traditional 4-H exhibits, as well as a piano contest and a cover band. Earlier in the week, "An Evening with Def Leppard" and a comedy routine by Jeff Foxworthy entertained guests. Parents, in between endless trips to the kiddie rollercoaster or the giant slide, inevitably find a craft booth or a snack to spark their interests. Plenty of others opted to relax on a bench, simply enjoying the atmosphere and watching the bustling crowds.

We ended our trip to the fair at dusk, just as the first lights were beginning to turn on for the evening, giving the fairground a magical glow for the crowds of people that began to arrive. In all, nearly 649,000 people attended the Bloomsburg Fair, making it the most successful yet, and ensuring that the beloved oval will be around for us to experience for many years to come.

Student artists are drawn to BrushStrokes

By Lauren Dana

It took quite some time for BrushStrokes' owners to assemble their prominent storefront along Market Street, but the persistence of its owners has since created a beautiful haven that attracts artists, enthusiasts and students alike. Full of sunlight and creative energy, the store's interior offers an amazing array of art supplies.

Ever since its opening 11 years ago by husband and wife team Randy and Kathy Snyder, BrushStrokes has been Lewisburg's main provider of artistic tools. With sleek racks ranging from the inevitable watercolors and brushes to the unique, such as Chinese brushes, Sumi ink and hand made paper, the store offers fare for the artist in everyone. The Snyders frequently order hard-to-find supplies if a customer needs something that the store does not normally carry. With such a diversification of supplies, wide range of prices and willingness to provide customers with their requests, we can hardly believe that BrushStrokes struggled to establish itself in town as it is today.

BrushStrokes began as a very small business located above Lewisburg's local pet store. Like all new businesses, it faced many difficulties, but the Snyders' motivation helped offset these obstacles. Although neither Kathy nor Randy particularly liked the business world, both loved art. Besides his enthusiasm for art supplies and his appreciation for the works of other artists, Randy creates his own pieces.

The Snyders' passion helped the two survive initial setbacks and fight persistent problems. Kathy remembers the hardships very well. "It is very hard starting a new business. It took a long time before we were able to break even, let alone make a profit." Luckily, however, long hours, hard work and dedication eventually amounted to a satisfying change for the Snyders; a year ago, BrushStrokes left the top of the pet store and moved into a larger space that is calls home today.

The Snyders continue to add to their dream, their small nook in Lewisburg with the creative energy of the artist. The beautiful decorum of BrushStrokes, in fact, creates a sort of artist's studio rather than a simple store. Large fireplaces line one side of the store while Randy's personal paintings add color to the walls. An immense window in the front of BrushStrokes allows light to gently fill the room, showcasing the neatly organized, shining rows of art supplies. The Snyders believe that the physical aspects of the store, when combined with friendly service, help to create a low-key, comfortable shopping environment.

The store continues to draw loyal customers from Lewisburg, the University and the surrounding area. For the future, the Snyders not only hope to maintain the high quality of their store, but also to enhance it by providing their customers with even more choices, products and prices. The Snyders also hope to create prints of Randy's artwork and sell them in the store.

Through determination and passion, the Snyders have, stroke by stroke, painted a portrait of successful entrepreneurship and artistic ingenuity that will long continue to serve the artist.

An Abroad Perspective: A semester down under

By Natalie Wightman

One year ago, I chose to study abroad at the University of Queensland in Brisbane, Australia, through a program offered by Butler University. In terms of personal development, this decision changed my life.

As fall semester drew to a close I was preparing to leave for the "land down under." How would I survive in an unfamiliar place where I knew no one?

Would I get along with my roommates? What if something happened to me? I felt as if I were once again entering my freshman year, except that this time, I would be traveling 10,000 miles from home.

When I boarded the plane out of New York on a cold February day, I was more nervous and excited than I'd ever been. I said goodbye to my parents, and began my journey.

Twenty-eight hours later, our group arrived in Brisbane. We were transported to our housing and given a chance to shower before we headed to the site of our three-day orientation. I had been placed in an off-campus house in the suburbs of Brisbane city with two other American girls. It was a small, older house, but quite suitable for the three of us. We each had our own room and shared a kitchen complete with dishes, and a small backyard. The campus was just a short walk down the road.

Our orientation program took place in a rainforest area three hours south of Brisbane. At 5 a.m. we awoke to the noise of tropical birds. I found that the rainforest is not a place for the jet-lagged.

After receiving all of our official information, meeting some of the people in our group and getting to know a little bit about Australia, we were divided into small groups of four to eight people and assigned to a "farm stay."

Each group was taken to a different farm where we lived with a family for two days to experience life in "rural Australia." I was assigned to a cattle farm run by a retired elderly couple, both of whom were very eager to share cultural experiences.

We were also taken on a tour of the extensive land plots around the farm and introduced to the "pets" of the house. These were two young orphan kangaroos for whom the woman was feeding and caring until they were old enough to enter the wild.

Shortly after, we returned to Brisbane to commence the semester. The initial adjustment period was hectic, but after a few weeks I had established myself, made friends and was planning various trips around Australia. I had Mondays and Fridays free of classes, so those four-to-five day weekends were devoted to traveling the continent.

Brisbane, situated on the East Coast of Australia, was an ideal home base for my journeys. About three hours south of the city were the beaches of Byron Bay and Surfers Paradise, two popular surfing spots. I did make an attempt at this popular Aussie sport, only to discover that it would be best for everyone if I remained a spectator.

Scuba diving, however, suited me better. I took a course through the university dive club to be certified as an open-water diver. It was offered early in the semester, so I was able to use my certification on trips to the northern part of Queensland.

Queensland was one of my favorite places in Australia, as it was so diverse. I was only in Cairns, Queensland's main outpost for four days, but during that time I was able to see the Daintree Rainforest (the oldest rainforest in the world) the Great Barrier Reef and the Atherton Tablelands (an area filled with lakes, rivers and waterfalls).

I also traveled further south of Brisbane to the bustling cities of Sydney and Melbourne. In Sydney, my friend and I stayed with her relatives, so we were able to visit places that the normal backpacker may not have seen. Although Melbourne's urban landscape paled in comparison to Sydney, it had its own hidden gems. South of the center city was The Great Ocean Road, one of the most beautiful areas I have ever seen. It is a great, long, winding road along miles and miles of surf.

On the road we stopped at Bell's Beach, the site of international surfing competitions, some small towns and the most magnificent site: the twelve apostles (huge limestone formations freestanding in the sea). We arrived there in the late afternoon on a sunny day and took a helicopter ride over the area are brought in from the fishing boats and sold each day. To top it off, we were also given a tour of the suburbs of Sydney, where we admired the mansions of Australia's elite.

When my semester finally came to an end and I was on the plane back home, I found myself wishing to be back in Australia. Though I was happy to see my family and friends, adjusting to life in the States and at Bucknell was, and still is, difficult. Studying abroad challenged me; it was one of the best experiences of my life. By immersing myself in a new culture, I came to appreciate life to the fullest.

University Concert Chorale performs in New York City cathedral

By Katie Hays

Paul Winter's "Earth Mass" performance is a place where the occasional canine "woof" can join—and even complement—the music of accomplished choirs, dancers and instrumentalists.

This weekend, the University's Concert Chorale traveled to New York City to sing with Winter's Consort in the annual Feast of St. Francis Mass, held at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine.

Paul Winter, whose innovative jazz CDs have won the recording industry's most prestigious awards, contacted Professor of Music William Pym, the director of the Concert Chorale, near the end of August. Winter told Pym that he had enjoyed working with the chorale last spring when they helped to perform his new work, "The Tree," on campus. Impressed with both their sound and their ability to learn quickly, Winter invited the chorale to join the annual "Earth Mass" event.

This weekend the 75 Concert Chorale members stepped into one of the world's largest cathedrals, merging with singers from the University of North Carolina, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, Strath Haven High School and the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, to form a group of approximately 300 voices.

At the practices preceding the Mass, the melody of singers may have noticed their awkwardness more than their shared talents; the director barked, "Look up! Put your feet down!" as the singers shuffled into rows, struggling to combine lyrics, dynamics and pitch.

All awkwardness dispelled, the Mass began at 11 a.m. as the five choirs assembled quietly in the rafters and choir loft for the celebration of St. Francis of Assisi's Feast Day. The audience received programs that stated the Mass' mission: "The precarious condition of the earth and its people calls all of us to feel more deeply and to think more clearly about the spiritual meaning of ecology, justice and love. Francis of Assisi dedicated his life to proclaiming the interdependence and mutual participation of all creation."

And it seems that "all of creation" did participate. Over four thousand people, with hundreds of their pets in tow, poured into the cathedral; Emily Thede, a Concert Chorale member, said, "Everyone and his dog were there. Literally."

And not only the audience was unique. The Mass juxtaposed snakes with saxophones, parrots with percussion and eagles with cellos, creating a celebratory sound complemented only by the occasional animal's cry. Pianists, guitarists and bassists played with the traditional organists as interpretive dancers in bright robes wove throughout the towering structure.

Between songs, the audience listened quietly to the readings from Genesis, "And God said, Let the waters bring forth swarms of living creatures." Grunts and birdcalls reinforced the biblical message.

The spoken Prayer of Thanksgiving, however, more closely captured the spirit of the gathering. "Those gathered said together, 'We give you thanks most gracious God, for the beauty of the earth and sky and sea... for the songs of birds and the loveliness of flowers, and for the wonder of your animal kingdom.'"

The Chorale sang nine hymns and celebratory songs during the course of the morning, including a choral prelude from the Be-attitudes and a closing song "For the Beauty of the Earth."

At the Mass' climactic conclusion, Arabian horses, llamas, ponies, cows and pigs emerged in the array of musicians and dancers. More animals followed; snakes, goats, bees, turtles, and parrots merged their way into the line of creatures for "The Living Earth" procession. In the choir loft surrounding the altar, the Chorale poured song over the movement below. The audience, sheep and owls joined them.

"The Concert Chorale was honored to receive the wonderful opportunity, to be invited by Mr. Winter and to perform in his 'Earth Mass,' Pym said.

Honor does play a great role. The unique and unpredictable beauty of the creatures, the strangely beautiful movement of the dancers and the rising sound of the Chorale created a celebration on Sunday-in this case, an honoring of the force that made such a celebration possible.

Two members of the University Concert Chorale join the celebration.

Paul Winter at a Glance

Paul Winter, has been called "one of the best representatives of new instrumental music."

In 1967, he started the Paul Winter Consort, where he fused his jazz roots with instrumental voices from other genres and cultural styles. Nature, the songs of whales, ethnic music and other sources for inspiration would shape what Winter and his musicians call "Earth Music," the natural music of the planet.

Winter and his Paul Winter Consort have won three Grammy prizes and have been nominated for the award eight times.

Besides giving his annual concerts at the St. John the Divine Cathedral, Winter tours the nation and has performed in over 2,000 concerts all over the world. Last spring, he performed "The Tree," an interactive concert in which the University Concert Chorale performed.

Market Street shop serves up sweets

By Adam Turbett

For our milder snacking needs, there is the C-store, but for those full-fledged candy cravings, however sometimes only Purity Candy's specialty sweets will satisfy.

Purity Candy, established in 1907, is located on Market Street next to Music and More. From its founder, Ford G. Birchard, to its newest owners, John and Marge Bureidnt, its reputation for quality candy has remained strong.

Upon entering the store, we realized that our wallets will lighten and our midsections will not. The mouth-watering aroma of minty chocolate wafers from the store as a fresh batch bakes; the wall-to-wall candy interior is a veritable smorgasbord of sweets.

Purity Candy sells simple taffy and lollipops, peanut brittle, truffles, fudge and the all-important 22-pound chocolate turkey (a great deal at only $75). The store also offers teddy bears and old-fashioned tins for gift packages, and their amaretto truffles are great. The prices are very reasonable in relation to the candy's quality. For example, a pound of assorted chocolates costs $10.75, and the store offers a 10% discount to all University students with the presentation of a valid ID.

One unexpected but welcome feature of the store is their readiness to ship candies anywhere in the world. While the business charges extra for this service, their rates range from only $5.50 (to ship up to $20 worth of candy) to $7.50 (to ship $30 to $50 worth of candy).

Finally, for when we desire candy but find ourselves too lazy to leave the dorm or house to get it, Purity Candy is available at 1-800-821-4748; they promise to deliver to your campus mailbox or doorstep.

And so, since it has thrived in downtown Lewisburg for nearly a century, we can assume that Purity Candy will continue to do so, as long as chocolate fans and candy connoisseurs remain to frequent it.

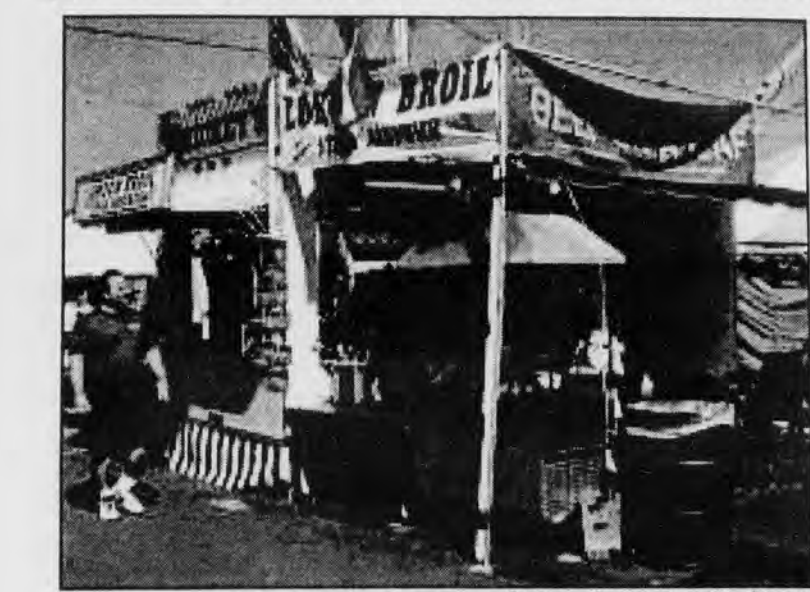

Winter plays his world-class soprano saxophone.

Purity Candy satisfies the sugar cravings of University students.

Cyrano de Bergerac to visit Weis Center

By Kacy O'Brien

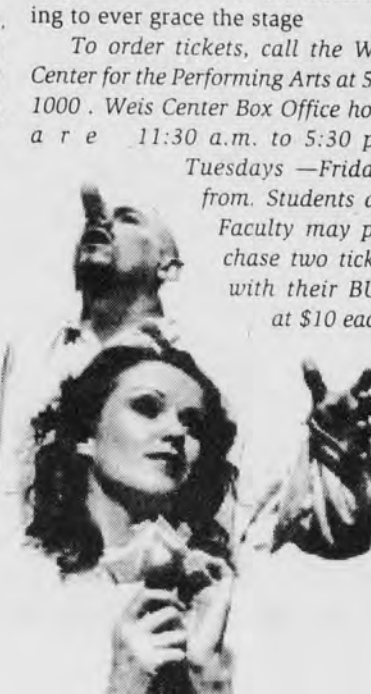

Cyrano de Bergerac. Cyrano who? De Bergerac. While you may not recognize the original French title, maybe this will spark your memory: Steve Martin, strolling down the sidewalk in preppy clothes, brandishing a tennis racket like a sword. Suddenly the camera pans to profile, and you have to wonder if Martin is doing a version of Pinocchio because his nose is huge—long, pointed and a bane to his existence. He is desperately in love with a beautiful woman named Roxanne (also the title of the American version) and the plot takes you through his plan to woo her through another man.

Well, this is the story of Cyrano de Bergerac, his famously huge nose and the unrequited love story written in the 19th century by Edmond Rostand. It is a tale of secrets, intrigue, a tale heart-wrenching romance and passion—a tale that is coming to Bucknell on at 8 p.m. on Friday, Oct. 13 in the Weis Center for the Performing Arts.

Cyrano de Bergerac will be performed by the renowned Aquila Theater Company, one of the best touring classical theater troupes in the world. Aquila was founded in 1990, drawing on talents from professional London and New York stages and is committed to presenting "fresh and inventive productions of classical drama designed to breathe life into texts, freeing the spirit of the original work." Aquila has toured in England, Canada and the U.S., recently being named Company in Residence at the Center for Ancient Studies at New York University and has also received a prize for Dramatic Excellence from Greece for their unparalleled commitment to classical theater, their productions with innovative focus on movement and visual arts, and original translations of Greek plays by Peter Meineke, the producing artistic director. Aquila has been praised as "the most exhilarating, inventive theater company... in many years," by The American Reporter, and lauded for their success at making "the classics... relevant [again] with superb acting and clever staging," by The New Yorker.

This is a show you don't want to miss. Get your tickets for Cyrano de Bergerac and enjoy a night of love, laughter and some of the finest acting to ever grace the stage. To order tickets, call the Weis Center for the Performing Arts at 577-1000. Weis Center Box Office hours are 11:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. Tuesdays—Fridays. Composer performs laptop symphony

Warren Burt performed nine live symphonies on his laptop Tuesday night

By Jennie Scheerer

When we think of the many uses our computers have, they generally include checking e-mail, searching the web and typing papers. But did you know that it is possible to play music on your computer, let alone an entire symphony?

Well, Warren Burt, an American composer who has been living in Australia since 1985, played an entire symphonic concert on his laptop this past Tuesday at the Weis Center Backstage.

Burt's performance was entitled, "Antipodean Collection: A Laptop Symphony," and it includes nine live performance computer music pieces, made between January and July 2000 with a Pentium II laptop.

To create the laptop music, Burt used Modular and AudioMidi software, and grouped them together into a loose symmetrical symphonic form. The odd numbered movements are instrumental, while the voice is used in the even numbered ones. Burt first performed his laptop symphony in a variety of venues, including the Planet Café and Café Retro, Fitzroy, the MusicBurt attended the State University of New York, Albany (BA '71) and the University of California, San Diego (MA, '75) before he moved to Australia in 1975.

In Australia he has worked in academia (La Trobe University, NSW Conservatorium, Victorian College of the Arts, Australian Nales based art-science think-tank International Synergy, the Broadcast Music Department of ABC Radio, the Monash University Music Department, the RMIT Department of Fine Arts, and the American Composers Forum.

Burt's work in computer music has been recognized internationally, including 1989 performances at was an artist-in-residence at the Djerassi Artists Program, California, and he was awarded a 1998-2000 Australia Council Composer's Fellowship. Currently, he is a freelance composer, and has recently founded the Centre for Studies in Experimental Music and Performance, a non-academic institution organizing classes, lectures and performances. From January to May 2001, he will be Visiting Professor of Composition at the University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign.

On Tuesday night, Burt was able to give students a glimpse into the future of music through his Laptop Symphony. Katie Palumbo, '04 said, "It was really interesting how Burt used technology and combined different sounds together to make music. All of his songs were really unique and different. Palumbo only had one negative thing to say about the performance: 'While the music was very beautiful at times, it lacked some of the emotion that I am used to seeing with musical performers.' Will technology eventually take the heart out of music? Or will Burt and other similar musicians start an entirely new genre of their own using their computers? Only the future will tell.

Arts Electronica, Linz, and Steirischer Herbst, Graz, and 1994-95 performances and installations in New Zealand, Australia, the US and Germany.

His electronic composition "La Strega Bianca della Luna II" was selected for inclusion in the 1999 Sonic Circuits International Electronic Music Festival. In 1998 he ed their latest recording, Who Are We Living For. Rooted in rock, reggae, and funk, Dispatch's upbeat music may best be described as a self-branded style of "tri-vocal funkacoustic instrument-swap groove."

Whether laying it back with a reggae vibe, walling on acoustic guitars or jamming on electric-driven grooves, the intensity of the band's three part vocals and harmonies rocked the University Saturday night.

The overwhelming success of DU's non-alcoholic presentation of Dispatch breeds hope for a return appearance. It seems that after Saturday night's show, students, administration and band members alike were pleased with the event.

Dispatch band member Brad Corrigan said, "Dispatch would love to come back. Bucknell's a great crowd to play for."

How many times have we all felt this paralysis in the company of others? The effect that people have on us is quite remarkable. Love can make us mute, it can also influence our beliefs and values. Brody captured this aspect for the poem called "The Hunt."

Misty Trezona '02 stood immobile as McDevitt and Abby Cizmar '02, made winding motions behind her as she lifted up with her arms straight out like a wind up doll. She then circled the around the stage reciting lines "I will lose 15 pounds for you. I will even dye my hair for you." But this person did not even exist yet.

The influence of the search for love leads some to change themselves to please others which is a sad commentary on our image-conscious society. Sometimes we get so wound up in the hope and prospect for love that we lose sight of who we really are.

In short, Savage/Love was more than just a play, it was reflection of our true thoughts about love and our ability to completely consumed by its power.

Students relate to emotions of Savage/Love

The student directed play identified the common emotions of relationships

By Hilary Trought

Love. Loss. Anguish. Infatuation. Longing. Renee Brody '01, in her directorial debut, blends poetry and rhythm in her rendition of Sam Sheppard's play, Savage/Love, described by the original author as, "an attempt to find a major expression between music and the actor."

Brody used her own creative expression to bring the characters to life by showing the audience the immeasurable capability of the spoken word. Savage/Love is a compilation of poems boasting real emotion and real experiences. These feelings were nicely complemented by the intonation of the flutist, trumpet, and drummer, music that was both improvisational by the musicians and Brody's personal interpretation of the poetry.

So what is love? Is it grand? Does it stink as they all say?

Love, an empowering emotion that ignites a something inside us all, can be the one thing that we will never understand. The premise of Savage/Love involves exactly that. At times, even while I sat there watching the characters speak their minds, I was seeing my own thoughts enacted.

Sam Sheppard creatively integrated rhythm and poetry into an expression of the "love-hate relationship we have with love," commented Trevor Rutledge '01 who was one of the five characters. "Love hurts like hell, but we need it to survive."

It's not often that love is regarded in a positive sense. Rutledge put it simply by saying it "hurts." And with poem titles like "Killing" and "Killing 2," it sometimes does. I caught myself chuckling during some of the prose—not because it was necessarily funny, but because it was so true.

In "Babble 1" and "Babble 2," a stuttering and stumbling Kate McDevitt, '01 tried to talk to the intended and tell him how she felt, but was too ner-

Field hockey captains stress team concept Best friends Yingling, Higgs and Russo aim to lead Bison to 2000 League crown

By Brian Klotz

Every sport has had its glory moments. For basketball, it might be Michael Jordan's final three point shot that he sunk before retirement, for football, it might be John Elway's dive into the end zone in the Superbowl XXII. For Bucknell senior field hockey captains Katie Yingling, Maura Higgs and Brett Russo, it was a special game against Lafayette.

"My freshman year, during parents weekend, we beat Lafayette for the first time in 18 years," Yingling remembered. "It was the most exciting game I have ever played in."

Moments like these are what motivate athletes to compete, but the tri-captains play their favorite sport for a variety of other reasons as well. "The best thing about playing field hockey is coming out every day and doing something you love," Russo said. "We also have such an incredible group of girls."

The trio all come from strong field hockey backgrounds. Russo began her career in fifth grade and played all the way through high school (Mt. St. Mary Academy, NJ). Both Maura and Katie began in seventh grade and played throughout their four years in high school (New Canaan, CT and Manhiem Township, PA, respectively).

Bucknell appealed to each of the captains for many of the same reasons. "I loved the campus, the people and it is a good academic school while having an emphasis on sports," Russo said.

Higgs said, "A lot of people from my high school came here, and everything I wanted, Bucknell had."

The freshman year for any student-athlete is definitely challenging, but the three captains were able to handle theirs in stride. "All the team members were great," Yingling said. "We had strong leaders who would drop anything to help us."

Strong leaders were a major key to the captains' future success, because they gave them someone to look up to. "We had four really strong seniors and two awesome captains," Higgs said, recalling former captains Tina Jones '98 and Sarah Caitlin '98.

Aside from playing hockey and practicing together, the three captains formed a very strong off-field friendship during their freshman year. "The three of us formed an immediate bond," Higgs said. Now the three are all members of, and understand, field hockey isn't the only thing there."

Head coach Heather Lewis has been one of the greatest contributors to the captains' careers. "Coach is absolutely amazing," Higgs said. "She always has so much time for us. We are her number one priority every day."

Lewis commented on what she thinks the captains bring to the team this year. "I think Maura, Katie and Brett have been instrumental in putting themselves in a position to compete for a championship this year," Lewis said. "The three of them together complement each other's strengths and weaknesses and have just been exceptional leaders."

Working together as captains can become trying at times, but it never seems too much for the trio. "We work well together even though we all have different strengths," Russo said. Higgs said, "We are a diverse group, but it all seems to balance out."

Individual and team goals are motivated a great deal by last year's 2-1 Patriot League Championship loss to Lafayette, and with eight of eleven starters back, things are expected to be much the same if not better. "It showed us how well we can do," Yingling said of Bucknell's title game run. "We need to stay consistent this year, even though the beginning of the season has been so up and down."

The three captains have had their hands full, balancing a full range of academics and sports over the years. Yingling holds a double major in international relations and German, Higgs studies political science and Russo is a management major. "When you are giving up three plus hours a day to practice, its tough," Russo said. "But coach always makes sure we are doing well, and understands field hockey isn't the only thing there."

Head coach Heather Lewis has been one of the greatest contributors to the captains' careers. "Coach is absolutely amazing," Higgs said. "She always has so much time for us. We are her number one priority every day."

Lewis commented on what she thinks the captains bring to the team this year. "I think Maura, Katie and Brett have been instrumental in putting themselves in a position to compete for a championship this year," Lewis said. "The three of them together complement each other's strengths and weaknesses and have just been exceptional leaders."

Volleyball wins first league match against Navy

By Patrick Evans

If Navy could serve our country as well as Bucknell served the volleyball on Friday, the seas would undoubtedly be a much safer place.

The Bison missed only two serves against the Midshipmen en route to a 3-0 victory (15-9, 15-4, 15-13).

"Our team stepped on the court ready to play," coach Cindy Opalski said. "It was our best match of the year so far."

The Orange and Blue marched all over Navy in the first two sets. The third set proved to be the most challenging as the Midshipmen jumped out to an 11-8 lead, but the Bison, showing how resilient they are, finished them off 15-13 to win the match.

Captain Brooke Bader '01 was nearly flawless versus Navy, recording 11 kills on 21 attempts with a .524 hitting percentage. The most outstanding part of her play was that she did not commit a single error in the entire contest.

"The team is really coming together," Bader said. "I really feel confident about what we can accomplish."

Jen Wrigley '03 and Brandi Trapasso '04 played exceptionally well on defense. Trapasso also contributed offensively with some key serves.

"The team has really started to click," she said, "and our serving was awesome."

Opalski has had her team working hard on their serving in practice throughout the whole year. What used to be a weakness of the team has become an undisputed strength. In crucial moments during the game, Bucknellaced the Midshipmen; further testimony to how hard this team has worked just how far they have come.

Whitney Williams '02 not only served well against Navy, but also led the team in assists. She executed enough assists in the match to place her third on the all-time list for set assists at Bucknell with 1324. She needs only three more to move into second place, and there is plenty of volleyball left for the junior to become the all-time leader.

The Bison look to improve their blocking for their upcoming matches. Melanie Gray '02 and Melanie Ghiz '03 have great blocking potential, and will be critical players in the future.

"We need to maximize their abilities in the next week or two in order to become very successful," Opalski said.

The Bison built on their momentum Tuesday, dropping Colgate 3-1 to improve their overall record to 6-11 and their Patriot League mark to 2-0.

Bader and Wrigley led the Bison, each recording double-doubles. Bader finished with 20 kills on 38 attempts and only four errors for a .421 hitting percentage. Wrigley recorded 14 kills along with 20 defensive digs.

The Bison challenge Patriot League rivals Army and Holy Cross on the road this weekend, with the hopes of remaining unbeaten in league play.

"This is a team that gets stronger and stronger as the season goes by," Opalski said. "They challenge themselves a lot more than teams in the past."

Seniors bring Bison "winning" attitude

By Mariel DeKranis

"I am an assistant," said senior Sam Graziano, alongside his teammate Geza Lendvai-Lintner. Yet, as the team leaders' they have passed on more than just the soccer ball.

They have taken full control of the team, not only by providing the offense, but also by developing the teammates.

"It's been fun," Lintner said. "Everybody has been confident, and we play the way we want to play." Leadership, offensive prowess, dedication, friendship and confidence are the elements of victory that have been evident in the game of the Bison Men's soccer team during the last couple of weeks.

Forward/midfielder Graziano is expected to move into the Top 10 in career assists at Bucknell at the end of the season. Although he is not considered a goal scorer, he emerges as a very dangerous playmaker.

Coach Brendan Nash feels that he is an All-Conference player, but he has to go out and earn it this season. Graziano is an essential figure at the team's practices.

"He knows our offense and he knows what I am thinking," Nash explained. "We expect the young guys to make mistakes and it is good to have someone like Sam there to help them learn the system and eliminate mistakes."

Bison water polo plays its "best polo of the season"

Despite going 1-3 at North/South Invitational, Bison hold their own against top 20 teams Massachusetts and Queens

By Brooke Rea

This weekend the Bison men's water polo team traveled to Princeton for the North/South Invitational, which featured many of the best teams on the East Coast. Going 1-3 overall, the Bison fell in two very close contests and played "their best polo of the season," according to head coach John Zeigler.

The Bison fell to three top 20 nationally ranked teams when they faced no. 15 St. Francis, no. 14 Queens and no. 10 UMass. In the last game of the weekend, Bucknell defeated a strong Brown team, 12-9, BU's overall record of 11-9 reflects nine losses, all of which occurred in games against top 20 teams.

Friday night the team traveled to Princeton for the St. Francis game, and had to play with no warm-up and four starters missing due to traffic problems.

"The team responded well," Zeigler said. "We had younger players stepping up to the challenge and more than holding their own against a talented St. Francis team."

Freshman John Kearney was one of the players thrust into the unfamiliar starting role. "Yeah, I was nervous," Kearney said, "but it was fun to step up and be able to fill in for the rest of the guys."

Seniors Kevin Permisohn and James Mante lead the team against St. Francis, who would later go on to defeat powerhouse Navy by eight goals. Permisohn led with three goals and four steals, and Mante had one goal and three steals of his own. Freshman Jamie Saetele also stepped up as a starter, adding two goals in the fourth quarter while tallying one assist and drawing a St. Francis ejection.

Other standouts were sophomore Dan Londerdal with four steals and two ejections drawn, Kearney with two assists and two steals, and sophomore Chris Saxton with three steals. Goalie Dave Kennedy '02 had 15 saves, but the young Bison were unable to fill in the attack and fell 13-6.

Saturday morning, a complete Bucknell team came ready to make up for the mismatch Friday night. An incredibly close game against talented Queens University proved that the Bison are ready to take on the best in the country.

The neck and neck contest began with a 1-0 deficit for BU in the first quarter which they would never make up. With each team scoring two, three and two goals in the following quarters, Queens was able to inch ahead to an 8-7 victory.

Senior Tate Gredtzer and junior Ryan McCarty led Bucknell's offensive attack with two goals each, and Saetele, Permisohn and senior co-captain Justin McCarty each added one. Londerdal stood out once again on the defensive end, with two steals and two ejections drawn.

The close loss was a sign of encouragement for the Bison, who were able to hold their own against a top-ranked team. Justin McCarty attributes the strength of the Bison to a newfound intensity. "This is the first weekend that everybody looked really excited and played with a fire in their eyes," he said. "We all really wanted to win some games."

This attitude kept the Orange and Blue rolling into their second close loss against defending Eastern Champions UMass, 13-11. Once again first quarter scoring proved to be the problem, as the Bison tallied one goal to UMass' three in the first.

"We played the best game of the weekend against UMass," Justin McCarty said. "Our defense worked really well because we dropped off and were able to anticipate the counterattack."

"Our drop and gap defense worked well to frustrate UMass," Zeigler agreed. "We didn't allow them to establish a hole game."

Bucknell's tenacity was reflected in the fact that they only had four ejections against them, while drawing eight against the UMass team. Only scoring on three of those eight, however, left the Bison to the fourth while scoring two of their own.

"I like to win," Justin McCarty said. "So I would say that the Brown game was the best of the weekend, even though we may have played better against UMass."

Gredtzer and Ryan McCarty led scoring once again with three goals each, while Mante netted two and tallied three assists. Permisohn was strong on both ends of the pool, nabbing one goal, two assists and a weekend-high five saves. Kennedy sealed the defense by denying 13 shots on goal.

"This weekend was really positive," Justin McCarty said. "We took some big steps as far as playing together as a team. Now we just need that final step, which is to put the game away."

Zeigler agreed and was happy with the weekend as a whole. "We have made many strong improvements in the last two weeks that have put us in a great position for our upcoming big tournaments this and next month," he said.

"This week we are concentrating on our man-up scoring and our first-period offensive production in preparation for the second set of league games at Navy this weekend," Zeigler said.

Women's golf finishes seventh at Princeton Invationals

By Catelyn Seleck

This past weekend, the Bucknell women's golf team traveled to Princeton, N.J., and placed seventh in the Princeton Invitational out of 16 teams, highlighted by Molly Campbell '02 hitting a team-low round for the season.

Bucknell challenged several ECAC rivals at the invitational and posted very competitive scores. The Bison's team total of 892 over the two-day, 36-hole tournament landed them in seventh place on the par-71 course. "The course was pretty long and hard to walk," Catherine Crews '03 said, "but it wasn't too tricky and there were no big surprises."

Leading the Bison at the tournament was Campbell, with a two-day total of 171. Jessica Henrich '03 and Hilary Mainka '02 were close behind with scores of 172 and 173, while Amy Jones '03 and Crews also had a good tournament, shooting a 182 and 194 respectively.

Campbell's final round score of 79 was a personal low and a new low score for the Bison for this season. "I felt pretty comfortable on the course after having already played in a couple tournaments this fall," Campbell said, "and that along with all the practice we have been putting in were probably the biggest contributing factors to my personal best score."

Personal-pool Yale seized first with a score of 619 and host Princeton secured second with a score of 627. Leading all individual scorers was Julia Allison of Princeton with a two-day total of 144, but it was not enough to edge the team to victory, as all of Yale's players shot under 80 in the second round of the tournament.

"The results are a big improvement for Bucknell from last year's Princeton Invitational, as the Bison improved their team score by 32 strokes."

"I am really proud of the way the team performed this weekend," head coach Kevin Jameson said. "I have seen a major improvement of the entire team since the beginning of the season."

"This weekend the Bison will return to New Jersey to play in the Rutgers Invitational and will face many of the same competitors."

Much-improved Bison preparing for Lehigh

By Kevin Logan

With the men's golf team about to wrap up its fall season at the Stabler Collegiate Invitational at Lehigh Sept. 13-14, it might be an appropriate time to step back and look at how our Bison, led by head coach Tommy Thompson '60, have performed thus far this season.

The fall season opened in upstate New York early last month at the Cornell-Colgate Invitational on Sept. 9-10. Although the Bison had trouble at this tournament last year, placing 17th, they weren't about to repeat their mistakes this time around.

Out of the 20 teams who took to the links, Bucknell finished up seventh overall, led by Dan Gale '02 and Jimmy Freeman '03. Freeman fired a third-place 147, including a three-under 69 in the second round, while Gale combined for a two-day total of 160 (77-83).

The following weekend, the Bison returned home, hosting 18 teams at the Bucknell Invitational. The home field advantage seemed to benefit Bucknell, as it strode into the clubhouse after eighteen with a four-stroke lead, due in part to a pair of 69's from captain Ken Kosteva '01 and Freeman.

"No players from the same team under par, that doesn't happen," commented senior Mike Gale.

Unfortunately, the lead would slip through Bucknell's fingers.

The Bison shot a combined total of 305 on Day 2, compared to the previous day's 294. That would leave them in a disappointing second, just three strokes behind Cornell.

Kosteva led the team with a 147 (69-78), fifth overall, while Freeman shot a 149 (69-80), including a hole-in-one on the par-three 13th.

The Bison then traveled on to Olean, NY, where they competed in the St. Bonaventure Keenan Invitational. Of the 18 participating teams, they finished second, edged out again by just three strokes, this time by American University.

Four golfers finished in the top 25: Freeman, Kosteva, Scott Leeder '04 and Charles Markey

Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian had, "I

Jimmy Freeman '03 following through.

'04. Freeman was third overall in individual scoring, firing a 145 (72-73).

Finally, it was on to the ECAC qualifier tournament in York, PA, this past Thursday. Freeman and Kosteva again led the team, shooting 75 and 79, respectively. However, it wouldn't be enough as the Orange and Blue netted an overall 316, 17 strokes off pace to qualify.

So now, with the Rutgers Invitational having been cancelled, the Bison are looking forward to their last major tournament of the fall season, the Stabler Collegiate Invitational. Last season, they placed 11th (Day 1) and 12th (Day 2) out of the 18 teams.

But according to Gale, another mediocre performance should not be any concern. "After being on the team for four years, I think that this year's team is the most solid we've had," he said.

"Bucknell has top ten finishes in each of our first four events, including two second-place finishes," Gale said, "and I think the team will continue to play well at Lehigh."

Scheu's collegiate pigskin pick-ems

By Tim Scheu

Featured game:

#2 Florida State @ #8 Miami

It's about time that this became a legitimate rivalry again. Back in the early 90s it seemed that Miami was the one thing that kept the Seminoles from winning multiple national championships. In fact, Florida State has had seven one-loss seasons and four of those years that loss came at the hands of their South Florida rival.

This year's game could produce a similar outcome. Florida State has not been invincible. In Week Two, Georgia Tech gave the Seminoles all they could handle, as Bowden and company escaped with a 26-21 victory.

This should be a game of offensive fireworks. In last week's contests, these teams outscored their opponents a combined 123-15.

Super-senior Chris Weinke of FSU is having another solid season, and could become the oldest player ever to win the Heisman. Likewise, Miami quarterback Ken Dorsey ranks sixth nationally in passing efficiency, as he has thrown nine touchdowns and zero interceptions.

Bottom Line: I would love to pick Miami, but the Seminoles are a more confident team than they were back in the early 90s.

Seminole 42, Canes 30

Payback:

#7 Ohio State @ #22 Wisconsin

Last season Ohio State had a 17-6 lead over the Badgers at halftime. It was then that Ron Dayne decided to wake up, scoring four times, and leading Wisconsin to 42-17 win in Columbus.

To say that the Buckeyes took it personally would be an understatement. The loss shattered the Bucks' confidence as they stumbled bled to a 6-6 record and finished eighth in the Big Ten.

This year it appears that the tables have turned. The Buckeyes are coming off a 45-0 rout of Penn State and remain undefeated, whereas the Badgers have fallen from grace with back-to-back losses to Northwestern and Michigan. The game is at Wisconsin, and John Cooper and company would love nothing more than to embarrass the Badgers at home. Wisconsin running back Michael Bennett will test the Buckeyes' defense, but Steve Bellisari will lead an emotional Ohio State team to victory.

Buckeyes 66, Badgers 10

#13 Auburn @ #22 Mississippi State

Following their upset of Florida last week, there is no team in the nation, (with the exception of Penn State... ha ha) more likely to have a let-down. Not only that, but Florida is facing the lone undefeated team in the SEC. (How is that possible?) Anyhow, the Tigers should hop on the back of Rudi Johnson, who has topped 100 yards rushing in each of his first five games, and run over Mississippi State. I mean, come on—this team lost to South Carolina.

Tigers 28, Bulldogs 20

Upset of the week:

#6 Michigan @ Purdue

Sure this isn't the most gutsy call, as it is only a matter of time before Drew Brees has a breakout performance, but I am thinking the Boilermakers will dominate. Joe Tiller will get his first win against the big three (OSU, U of M and PSU), and do it in a big way.

Boilermakers 35, Wolverines 13

Situations. Powell was named Patriot League Offensive Player of the Week for the second time this season after rushing for 215 yards and four touchdowns on 40 carries. "My goal this summer was to be able to carry the ball as many times as possible, so I'm glad to be getting the carries," said Powell of his workmanlike day.

As long as Powell is ready to carry the ball, the Bison will keep giving it to him. After his second 200 yard game of the season, he has elevated himself among the nation's leaders in rushing yards and all-purpose yards per game.

Another thing that the Bison have been working on that was visibly improved this week was the kicking game. Chris Lundberg '03 went five for five in extra point attempts, and the Bison have to be a little bit more at ease to know that this part of their game is more dependable. Coach Gadd was generally pleased with the way his football team played on Saturday, focusing on the team's intensity. "If we play hard, we play well; if we don't, we are beatable," he said.

Even though the Bison defeated Duquesne handily and have now won three straight games after losing the season opener, the Bison had 14 penalties that brought them back a total of 191 yards on Saturday. "Penalties take the fun out of the game," Gadd said. As strong as the Bison looked on Saturday on both sides of the ball they will be much stronger if they can cut down on their penalties.

This weekend the Bison travel to Georgetown to take on their future league opponent. Georgetown will join the Patriot League in the fall of 2001.

The following week the Bison open up their league schedule against Lafayette at Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium.

US sleepwalks in Sydney

By Rob Schmicker

In 1988, the United States basketball team was made up of a bunch of college kids, and coached by Georgetown's John Thompson. This was no different than in years past, when American collegiate players were sent to the Olympics to take on professional players from The Soviet Union, Yugoslavia and the rest of the world. The only difference in 1988 was that the United States lost in the semifinals to the Soviets. It was only their second loss ever in Olympic competition.

The US Olympic Committee finally got tired of having the rest of the world bring their professionals to play against their amateurs from the US. So in 1992, the United States brought professionals to the Barcelona Olympics for the first time. The Dream Team, as it would come to be called, was born and Olympic basketball has never been the same since.

In 1992, the team was made up of Michael Jordan, Magic Johnson, Larry Bird, Charles Barkley, Patrick Ewing, Karl Malone, David Robinson and others. It was simply the finest collection of basketball talent ever put on one team. They easily walked over the Olympic tournament, embarrassing nations like Angola by 40 or more points. Everywhere they went, pictures were taken and autographs were asked for. Their games weren't games at all, but more like shows or performances.

Fast forward four years to Atlanta. After the Barcelona Olympics, everyone expected Dream Team 3 to easily walk through the tournament again. They didn't let the home crowd down as they won each convincingly before getting a test from Yugoslavia in the Gold medal game. Once again, the Dream Team had brought home gold. With the retirement of Jordan and Barkley, the Americans knew they would have to find new talent to pass the torch on to.

Introducing Dream Team 5, who collectively have no championship titles, and only one repeat Olympian. Surely this bunch of All-Stars would do no worse, and would dominate all opponents. Or so we thought.

During the preliminaries, the US went 5-0, outscoring opponents by an average of 101-72. But the 29-point margin was greatly padded by ridiculous 46 and 47 point victories against New Zealand and China respectively.

You know something is not right when France (yes, France) hung around all game only to lose by 12 points in the preliminaries.

Then in the next round they beat Russia by 15, Lithuania by only 2, and then France in the Gold Medal game by 10. If you didn't know any better, you would think that we had a bunch of amateurs on the court, rather than the best basketball team in the world.

So what was wrong? Some say the talent wasn't as good as it could have been. Some say the Americans were too cocky. Some may also say that the rest of the world is just getting better.

I think that it's a little of each. You could have suited up another Dream Team of players who for one reason or another didn't play: Shaq, Kobe, Grant Hill, Tim Duncan and Scottie Pippen. As it is, Alonzo Mourning is the best center in the Olympics, but can you imagine Shaq going against a team like Angola?

Even without those key players, the Dream Team couldn't lose. The players knew that and the world knew that. That reason, the Americans believed that everyone hated them and wanted them to lose. All tournament long they seemed to be distracted by it. The result was overconfidence. "Hey we're the Dream Team... We can walk in here and beat up on everyone." But that doesn't seem to be true anymore.

As for the world getting better, its going to happen. But they're not good enough to beat the Dream Team. At best, Lithuania is as good as a CBA team. Any NBA team should have no problem beating them, let alone an All-Star team from the NBA. The problem: the US played sloppy and allowed the Lithuanians to stay close. It seemed as if they cared more about Vince Carter's spectacular dunks than running a simple offense. Few people can stop Mourning and Kevin Garnett in the NBA, let alone Lithuania. Why they didn't get more touches is beyond me.

Allan Houston said, "It was a little bit tougher than I thought. Nobody can tell us we didn't earn it. That's what makes it even more special." I don't think he could have been more correct because no one expected it to be that tough.

But maybe we're missing the picture. The Dream Team is under extraordinary pressure to win and to win big. When they had a bad day, they got booed off the court, but they still won. Isn't that all that matters anyway? So they didn't win by 40 every game. So they were ugly in most games. They were able to get over the fact that they weren't on their game, and they still pulled it off. That in itself deserves some praise, something this Dream Team has not been used to.

Time for MLB Octoberfest

Two hundred players, 62 games, 26 days, eight teams, one title.

October has arrived and the race for the World Series has begun with its own share of surprises. Who would have thought that the defending Champions, the New York Yankees, would be the team with the worst record heading into the postseason, outshined by their cross-town rivals, the Mets?

Or that the Chicago White Sox, who had a .466 winning percentage last season would be the first to clinch a playoff spot in the American League? Here's a brief look at the teams and how they match up.

The National League: The two-time wildcard winner New York Mets will take on the San Francisco Giants who hold the best record in baseball. This season, the Giants are 5-3 against New York, having swept a four game series at Pac Bell Park in May.

This doesn't bode well for the Mets who have struggled on the road this season (three games under .500) and must play three out of a possible five in San St. Louis finds itself postseason bound, but without Big Mac Fran. The pitcher match-ups favor the Mets immensely, with their two ace Southpaws, Leter and Hampton, on the mound.

The Giants lineup has done poorly against lefties this year, batting 12 points lower as a team and going 19-20 against left-handed starters. What the Mets need is a reliable leadoff hitter, a position they may have filled with rookie stand-out Tim Lincecum. He adds speed to a lineup that came in second to last in the NL in stolen bases this year.

This will put pressure on the weak defensive catcher Bobby Estalella who has only thrown out 33 percent of would-be stealers. Forget about Mike Piazza's slump. He's well-rested and ready to live up to his reputation, not to mention his paycheck. And if he doesn't, the Mets will still pull it out. Like all New York teams, the Mets are adept at skirting the precipice of oblivion only to pull themselves back at the last minute. Look for an upset in the Bay Area.

Meanwhile, the Atlanta Braves go up against the St. Louis Cardinals in Missouri after losing home-field advantage through the playoffs. There are a number of concerns about both teams. First, what will happen to the Cardinals without Golden Glove catcher Mike Matheny who served tendons in his left hand earlier this season?

Unfortunately for St. Louis fans, the Braves led the major leagues in stolen bases and without Matheny, who had thrown out 50 percent of would-be thieves in 2000, the Cards are left to wonder whether or not their backups will be able to step up. Ever more important is the health of Mark McGwire, who came off the DL in early September and will only play in a pinch-hitting capacity.

Instead, the Cards will look to the candidate Jason Giambi and rookie sensation Terrence Long. Giambi has proven himself down the stretch. The big question for Oakland is whether or not Jason Irvin, in his first full year as a closer, will be able to finish the big game.

New York suffers the same problem that afflicts the Braves: a volatile bullpen. Outside of closer Mariano Rivera, the Yankees have no proven set-up man, and no one to bring the game safely to the eighth and eighth if things go poorly for their starters. The first game will be critical to the series. So long as NY can solidify their pitching and get their hitting back on track, then Oakland's September will be just another highlight reel, and for the Yankees, a distant memory best forgotten.

As for the Chicago White Sox, they head into the postseason against the Seattle Mariners with two question marks looming overhead: injury and inexperience. The most pressing issue is that three of their top four starters (Siroka, Eldred and Baldwin) are all operating at less than 100 percent.

In addition to their pitching woes, the Chi Sox are almost thoroughly untested in postseason play. Up and down the line, Chicago is oozing with inexperience. In order for the Sox to succeed, MVP candidate Frank Thomas must do what he's done all year: play the part of Yoda, and teach his young lineup how to play postseason baseball.

The Mariners, on the other hand, have October experience and A-Rod and Martinez may be able to take advantage of a White Sox defense that is more porous than a loofah. The question in this series will be whether or not the Sox can drive in 6 runs a game as they did in the regular season or whether they will fall victim to a strong Mariners' rotation and an even stronger bullpen, led by rookie closer Kazuhiro Sasaki who set the record for most saves ever by a rookie (37). Look for the Mariners to edge the Sox with defense, experience and a solid bullpen.

Yet Oakland is the team entering October at a break-neck clip, led by MVP

NFL Experts' Picks

By Ali Ahmed and Justin McCarty

Pittsburgh at NY Jets

The Steelers are finally starting to get on track after a very shaky start; their two latter losses were by only three points each. Bettis will need to run consistently like he has in the past three games, gaining 307 yards and scoring four touchdowns, in order to keep pressure off of the Steelers passing game. The Jets are flying high after their win last week, and there is no reason to think they'll come down. Testaverde is finally showing signs that he is fully recovered from last year's season-ending injury, and the Jets better hope that he is—mainly because Martin will have no room to run against the tough defensive line of the Steelers. Pittsburgh is allowing an average of only 2.9 yards/carry (third in the AFC) and allowing an average of only 78 yards per game (fourth in the AFC). The Jets may need to depend on last minute heroics if they hope to win like they did last week versus Tampa Bay. These Steelers will shoot the Jets down, handing them their first loss of the season.

Justin's pick: Steelers 17-13

With Pittsburgh at 1-3 and the Jets at 4-0, what might look like a mismatch might actually not be. The Jets have relied on big plays in the fourth quarter so far to keep them undefeated, but that can last only so long without a great threat on offense. The Jets usually rely on their workhorse Curtis Martin to carry them early and he might have his work cut out against a surging Pittsburgh defense, should be able to clean up after them. After that, I like the Pittsburgh secondary against Wayne Chrebet and his fellow receivers. Where the game will probably be decided is on Pittsburgh's offense. If they play a good balance of pass and run and pass protect against the Jets blitzing defense, they should be fine. Pittsburgh's offense has a lot of good pieces—they just need to put it together.

Ali's pick: Steelers 27-23

Baltimore at Jacksonville

Since Week 4, when the Ravens defeated the Jaguars, 39-36, the Jaguars have gone 1-2—averaging less than 14 points a game—while the Ravens have gone 2-1 with two shutouts—giving up only 19 points. The Ravens' running game ranks first in the AFC, averaging 142.2 yards a game; this is complemented by their rushing defense, which leads the league by only allowing an average of 41.8 yards a game and 2.0 yards a carry. The major concern for Jacksonville will be its offensive line. It will need to protect Brunell who has been sacked 12 times in the past two games. It will also need to open up holes and attempt to establish a non-existent rushing game. The only two wins the Jags have were against two teams that combined for only a total of five wins last season. Look for these Ravens to soar over the Jaguars.

Justin's pick: Ravens 30-20

Everybody is saying that the Jaguars are done for this season because they are an abysmal 2-3 and lost last week to the Steelers—yes, the Steelers. First of all, the Jaguars have had a lot of injuries and their losses have come to AFC rivals Indiana, Baltimore and Pittsburgh. I think that the Jaguars are better than their record shows, especially if James Stewart and their linebackers get healthy. Still the Ravens are on an absolute tear on defense, while their offense is still ironing things out but has the potential to be explosive. If Baltimore can dominate the Jaguars' offensive line, then the Ravens' corners should have an easier time handling McCordell and Smith. If that happens, the Ravens' offense should be enough to win them the game.

Ali's pick: Ravens 23-13

Tampa Bay at Minnesota

This matchup consists of a top offense and a dismal defense against a dismal offense and a top defense—the Vikings and Bucs respectively. The Vikings offense has been all but unstoppable with Culpepper at the helm. The offensive line will need to protect him and give him time to pass against a fast-rushing Bucs' defense; however he has big playmakers as receivers and is great at scrambling. This game will ultimately be decided on by the matchup between Minnesota's receivers and Tampa's throwing into coverage. The Bucs will also need Alstott and Dunn to lead the offense and keep the team out of passing situations. These Vikings will make the Buccaneers walk their own plank.

Justin's pick: Vikings 28-17

Suddenly the Bucs do not look like the dominating super bowl favorites they were tabbed as earlier in the season, and this week they go against the perfect Minnesota Vikings. Of course when it comes to playing Minnesota, the problem is how to deal with Randy Moss and Chris Carter—which is probably the most dominating offensive duo in the NFL, excluding Indy's Bruce and Holt. As John Madden said, "It was to make a team, I would start with Randy Moss." That basically will be the Vikings' defense can take Mike Alstott

Leave it to a farmer

Wake up! The 2000 Olympics are here. Oh wait—they're over. In 17 days of competition, no inspirational story captured the hearts of the nation, no moment caused us to sit on the edge of our seats and no triumph caused mom's and pop's to wave the Red, White and Blue proudly out their windows. There was no 1980 Hockey team, no Greg Louganis, no Kerry Strug.

We watched (well not nearly as much as NBC would've liked), we read articles about drug scandals and Team USA's floundering, and we witnessed the continuing corporatization and professionalization of the Games. We might have taken the time to shake our head once or twice at what's become of the Games, and then, life went on.

But before Sydney becomes a blurry memory, I want to present one meaningful story from the 2000 Games that might renew a shred or two of hope.

Wyoming dairy-farmer Rulon Gardner felt extremely privileged just to represent the United States in Greco-Roman wrestling after upsetting 1996 silver medalist Matt Ghaffari in the U.S. trials. Little did the 286-pound Gardner, whose previous highest international finish was fifth, know that after battling back from behind to defeat Israel's Juri Yusevych, 3-2, he would go on to the finals against three-time defending Olympic champion Alexander Karelin of Russia.

Karelin, who hadn't lost a match since the 1987 Soviet championships and astonishingly hadn't allowed a point in the last ten years, is universally regarded as the greatest Greco-Roman wrestler of all time. He once again didn't allow a point in all the prior rounds of the 2000 Games and, at 33, was expected to ride off into the sunset, donning his fourth Olympic gold medal.

All he had to do was dispose of Gardner, who would surely be seen as one of the best surprises and heroes of the Games just by securing the silver.

Everything was as it should—except that Gardner wasn't about to just hand Karelin the gold based on his reputation. Gardner withstood a first-period barrage by Karelin, in which the Russian (who did I mention has a left named for him) unsuccessfully tried to throw Gardner around. The American stayed chest-to-chest, shoulder-to-shoulder with Karelin, never allowing him to get the necessary leverage to toss him and score points.

The key moment of the match occurred during the second period, which begins with both wrestlers in a clinch that must remain locked until one wrestler executes a scoring move or releases his lock. As the giants powered each other across the ring, Gardner held his clasp, while Karelin's hands slipped apart.

After watching the tape for 90 seconds, the referees concurred that Karelin's grasp did indeed break and they awarded one point to Gardner—giving Karelin his first deficit since the 1988 Olympic finals.

"He had a great lock on me, and another three or four inches I would have let it slip," Gardner said. "But I always wrestle kind of unorthodox, and our feet got tangled and I got under him. Maybe it confused him. But I said to myself 'He broke' and I got the point."

Karelin attempted several scoring moves in response, but his attempts became fewer and less threatening as the nine-minute mark approached. Finally, with eight seconds remaining in the match, Karelin quit wrestling, dropped his hands and conceded defeat; Gardner warily watched the final seconds tick off before beginning his celebration of the greatest upset in wrestling history.

No one believed that Gardner could win before the match—not even Gardner for sure. But after holding off Karelin's initial charge and displaying enough strength to rattle the Russian, Gardner's confidence grew.

"When did I think I could beat him? About 10 minutes ago," Gardner said. "I kept saying, 'I think I can. I think I can.' But it wasn't until it was over that I knew I could."

After his triumph, Gardner wrapped himself in an American flag while the stunned crowd saluted his efforts. He was selected to lead the U.S. team in the closing ceremony by carrying the flag.

"I don't know how big a deal this is," Gardner said. "All I know is that I did tonight what I always try to do, go out and win a match. It's personal satisfaction knowing I did it. But this isn't my ultimate goal. My ultimate goal is to know that I can do the best that I can. I don't think money or this can give you happiness. You have to find happiness from doing your work."

And work for Gardner is milking cows and lifting bales of hay. It might be simple, but it's American. And if a guy living the American dream isn't going to knock the rest of us out of our Olympic slumber, then nothing is.

Eiben's career day paces Bison

Lucas Phillips '01 looks downfield as a Duquesne defender approaches.

By Cory Nadler

Kevin Eiben '01 has made big plays before, but he has never had an interception in each quarter of a game. Neither has any player in the history of the Patriot League, and only one person in Bucknell football history has had four interceptions in one game.

Eiben's big plays almost overshadowed the day that Jabu Powell '02, and the rest of the Bucknell football team had in its 35-14 romp over previously undefeated Duquesne.

The Bison nearly doubled the Dukes in time of possession and more than doubled their yardage.

For the second week in a row the Bison got the game started the right way. After the defense held the Dukes on their first drive and forced them to punt, the Bison marched down the field, with Powell finishing the drive with a one-yard touchdown run on fourth-and-goal.

Later in the first quarter Eiben recorded his first interception of the game, giving the ball back to Bison quarterback Lucas Phillips '01, who led Bucknell down the field by completing key passes to Kyle Harris '02. The Bison again found themselves with a fourth-and-goal on the Dukes' one-yard line. They went back to Powell, who punched the ball through for his second touchdown of the day, putting the Bison ahead 14-0.

Phillips had a much better day passing the ball than he has had all year long, and he attributed much of his success to his offensive line. "The offensive line played a hell of a game," Phillips said. "I felt comfortable in the pocket."

Coach Tom Gadd also credited the offensive line with helping the offense become much more balanced, as the Bison now have a potent passing attack to complement their running game.

Following Eiben's second interception, Powell dove over the pile at the goal line to score his third touchdown on the day midway through the second quarter, once again from one yard out. The play of the defense helped set up the majority of the Bison scoring drives throughout the game.

The Dukes picked up a fumble and ran it in for a touchdown late in the second quarter, but missed their extra point try. The Bison took a comfortable 21-6 lead into half time, and built on it in the third quarter.

Once again it was Eiben setting up the Bison offense for a score—this time with a long punt return. Even though much of the run was called back to a penalty, the Bison still had favorable field position.

Women's soccer struggles with consistency

By Chuck Vicente

The Bucknell women's soccer team won a close game over St. Francis, 2-1, but fell short to Towson, 3-1, this week. Teamwork and consistency made both games a struggle.

"Our main problem is that we did not play as a team," said tri-captain Anna Hall '02.

The Bison traveled to St. Francis on Wednesday and played their fifth overtime game of the season. St. Francis took an early lead with a goal at the 41:58-minute mark. This would be their only goal of the contest.

Savannah Rennels '04 lit up the Bucknell scoreboard in the seventh minute of play. Tara Uchel '03 led with a corner kick, and Rennels capitalized off the feed, tying the game 1-1.

Bucknell could not score in the remaining time, and the first overtime period went scoreless as well. In the second overtime, Uchel beat her defender and fired the game-winning shot from 10 yards away. Uchel upped her season totals to four goals and three assists with her goal and assist in the game. Laurie Purse '03 grabbed her sixth win of the season in cage for the Bison, saving five shots in the contest.

The Orange and Blue started out slow in the first half but were able to pull away with the victory with confident overtime play.

Since we have been in so many overtimes this season and been successful, we have a confident attitude going into extra periods," Rennels said.

Bucknell hosted Towson last Sunday and suffered a 3-1 loss. The Bison came into the game fired up but lost their momentum.

Right off the opening whistle, Rennels trapped a feed from Uchel and placed the ball into the top of the net. Rennels scored with on 00:59 on the clock—the quickest goal of the season.

The Bison held their 1-0 lead through the first half, but just as fast as Bucknell started the game, Towson took control of the second half.

Jay Magriss—The Bucknellian Lauren Schwarz '03 on the attack.

Towson scored three goals, one of which was a penalty kick, and held their 3-1 lead until the end of the match.

Cross country team splits, dominates both meets

By Rose Sedo

Divide and conquer—that's just what the Bison men's and women's cross country teams did this past weekend when they split their squads and excelled at both Lock Haven and Susquehanna.

Continuing what has been so far a successful season by winning the meet at Lock Haven, the men's team finished with 21 points, well ahead of runner-up Shippensburg with 84 points. The women's team swept the top three places to win the event with 17 points.

At the Susquehanna Invitational the men's team finished first with 24 points, while the women's team finished second behind Susquehanna with 47 points.

Results at Lock Haven include an impressive performance by senior Kevin Weatherill '01, who finished as the men's top runner for Bucknell. Weatherill crossed the line in second place with a 10,000-meter time of 31:32.48 and was followed by teammates Brad Wertz '01, Greg Costello '03 and Evan Honeyfield '02 who finished in third, fourth and fifth place respectively. With their help, the Bison placed seven in the top 10 and 13 in the top 20 to dominate the race.

"We improved and that was our main goal for the weekend. Not to mention, it was nice to get a 10K race in for the guys," Wertz said.

On the women's side, junior co-captain Becki Marshall captured first place with a 6,000-meter time of 21:30.72. Theresa Dennis '03 and Anna Heikilla '04 finished second and third, respectively, with times of 21:55.65 and 21:57.96.

The Bucknell women placed five runners among the top 10 and seven among the top 20.

At the Susquehanna meet, senior Matt Davis finished as the men's top runner for Bucknell, finishing in second place with a time of 27:20. Freshman Nicholas Moussetis wasn't far behind in third place, clocking in at a time of 27:22.

Eric Heikkila '04 was fourth in 27:33, while classmates Sean McCarthy and Marcus Jones finished eighth and ninth in times of 27:50 and 27:54, respectively. The Bison placed four in the top 10 and 10 in the top 20 to dominate the races.

On the women's side, Michelle

Baylor '03 was the women's top finisher, crossing the line in sixth place with a time of 20:51. Freshman Stephanie Keller '04 and sophomore Nicole Lynn '03 finished eighth and ninth with times of 20:54 and 21:04, respectively.

The Bucknell women placed seven runners among the top 20. All in all, the team was very pleased with the results of both competitions.

"We're extremely happy with what went down this past weekend. We are on the right track, and there were just some exceptional performances made," coach Art Gulden said.

The Bucknell men's and women's cross country teams will be back in action on Sat., Oct. 14, when they travel to Iowa State for the Pre-NCAA Meet.

Scholarships may raise financial questions

By Brian Watson

In less than two months, University President Steffen Rogers will participate in a landmark vote for the Patriot League. In the meantime, University officials have begun examining the financial implications involving the possibility of offering both academic and athletic scholarships for the first time in its history.

The December vote does not necessarily mean that the University will vote to extend scholarship funding. Several Patriot League schools already offer scholarships for academics and athletics, but the University has never offered anything but need-based aid. The University will not be obligated to extend permissive aid regardless of the vote's outcome.

"If Bucknell is not philosophically comfortable with offering aid of any kind, we shouldn't do it," Interim Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 said. "Whatever we do must be consistent with our mission."

Though the possibility of new scholarship programs may immediately imply a necessity for increased fundraising, Pollock said that any changes will be incremental.

Several faculty members have expressed worries that funding scholarships will result in reductions in existing programs. Pollock said it is "highly unlikely" that money would be pulled from other programs. "A likely scenario is that we will re-deploy the money that is currently committed to preferential aid," he said. "The remainder will be acquired through fundraising."

Professor of Management Tim Sweeney, who serves as the University's faculty representative to the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) said: "I think we could enhance the academic quality of our student population by using merit aid wisely. If such aid were used wisely, I don't think it will take away funds from academic programs."

According to Pollock, any new funding programs will involve only incremental increases in current merit aid because many student-athletes already receive need-based aid. Pollock, who has executive oversight of the athletic department and serves as an ex officio member of the Committee on Admissions and Financial Aid, said, "It's important to remember that not every dollar committed to athletic merit aid will be new dollars."

The remaining money will be collected through fundraising efforts. The E-leaders brings dot-coms to campus

By Jennifer Jenchura

A family of motivated speakers and enlightening panelists assembled last week to discuss the new economy and the Internet during the first ever E-leaders@Bucknell Symposium.

Sponsored by the University, Andersen Consulting and General Electric, the symposium was held in the Langone Center on Oct. 12-13. Bucknell parents, alumni and leading industry experts gathered to tell students and interested adults about their experience with e-commerce.

Activities opened last Thursday with an Andersen Consulting Panel Discussion. Other events included a welcome dinner and welcome address by University President Steffen Rogers, several panels and featured speakers.

Students were given an opportunity to network with big shots at such companies like Andersen Consulting, AOL, General Electric, Prudential Securities, QVC and The Weather Channel.

Students were given an opportunity to network with big shots at such companies like Andersen Consulting, AOL, General Electric, Prudential Securities, QVC and The Weather Channel.

Rogers introduced the seminar as "a wonderful educational and networking opportunity for interested Bucknellians."

Career information, education and business networking were part of the program's overall goals. Main themes were entrepreneurship, marketing and emerging technology. Over 270 people registered for the symposium including 200 students.

Approximately 250 people attended at least two sessions. Scott Rosevear of the University Relations department coordinated the conference.

According to Rosevear, the symposium was intended to share information about e-business and the New Economy by examining the different types of business forces shaping them. The conference was a huge success.

"Feedback from surveys indicates that there is a strong interest on the part of students, alumni and parents to do this event again. Students were extremely positive and enthusiastic. We plan to do it again next year," Rosevear said.

Most of the featured presentations were well attended such as Lending Tree.com CEO Doug Lebeda's '92 discussion, "Management 101," and Ann Brackbill '82 of AOL spoke on "The Internet: It's About Consumers."

Scott Solomon '03 who attended the Brackbill presentation, said she made the audience realize that, "everything done on the Internet is targeted."

Homecoming hosts selected

By Rebecca Rowland

Eight lucky seniors have been chosen to represent the University as Homecoming hosts and hostesses.

Faculty and staff, as well as all registered campus organizations, were able to nominate seniors they felt represented the student body. Once this preliminary stage was completed, the nominees were voted down to 24 by a panel of faculty and staff.

These 24, 12 men and 12 women, were then voted down to the final eight by the general student body.

The hosts and hostesses' responsibilities will begin next weekend as they officiate at the many scheduled Homecoming festivities.

The long-term requirements include remaining in close contact with the Office of Alumni Affairs and organizing their five-year class reunion.

Town, students meet to resolve issues

Students meet district attorney, police chief and residents to share their concerns

By Heather Napolitano

Round two of discussions concerning recent issues in the borough took place last Wednesday night in an open meeting coordinated by Dean of Students Richard Ferraro.

The University extended invitations to Lewisburg Chief of Police William Nietz, District Attorney Pete Johnson, Lewisburg residents and University students living off campus.

"A fair number of students said that it would be very useful if I could invite the police chief and the DA to meet with students to clarify what is expected and how students can work with the police and the town," Ferraro said in a recent email.

But despite any prior expression of interest, a total of only 11 students and four Lewisburg residents attended the 9 p.m. meeting.

"I'm a little disappointed really," Ferraro said. "I had thought there would be a bigger turnout."

Associate Dean of Students Gerald Commerford voiced off-campus students' concerns through a list of questions compiled from student emails. He asked whether an individual would be penalized if he or she called the police for assistance in removing unwanted individuals from a party.

"If you're having a problem with someone who's crashing your party... you're not going to have a problem with the police," Nietz said.

This is provided that the student having the party calls the police before neighbors complain, he or she is willing to identify the individuals previously asked to leave and the student is willing to testify against those individuals in a courtroom.

"The police are here to protect you as well as the permanent residents," Ferraro said.

Nietz informed the students that the primary complaint received by Lewisburg police is excessive noise, specifically loud music. According to Johnson and Nietz, residents often feel that calling the police is their only recourse.

"It is not likely that [a Lewisburg resident] is going to knock on a door during a party with 50 or 60 people drinking beer and ask you to turn the music down," Johnson said. Students in attendance expressed frustration with the increased presence of police in the borough, and the unpleasant interactions taking place between themselves and the officers.

"I think the relationship between the police and the students is very important and it is very bad right now," senior Nevine Shahine said. "I think students feel like police are just waiting [to come get us]."

Nietz indicated that the current measures are necessary. Past policies and tactics have proven to be insufficient, and residents have gone to the Lewisburg council and expressed the inability to tolerate the activity any longer.

"People on the south side of town feel like they're being punished," Nietz said. "They don't have these problems on the north side."

The no-tolerance policy adopted by Lewisburg police is deemed a direct result of off-campus activities.

Urban Millennium show a hit

By Natalie Qas

Smith Quad was overtaken by the sights and sounds of a veritable Urban Millennium last Saturday afternoon as senior Natalie Sopic's debut fashion show was revealed on-campus.

Over 250 students were present to experience the curious advertisement of an "Urban Millennium" fashion show.

The quad was transformed into an authentic replica of a New York runway, complete with exquisitely choreographed music and enthusiastic beautiful models. But these accoutrements were quite frankly upstaged by the ingenious designs and lavishly innovative creations generated by the creators' stylish inspiration.

Sopic, who will be graduating in December and plans on pursuing a career with Vogue magazine, was the director and stylist of "Urban Millennium." She started planning her fashion show last spring by organizing a school-wide clothing drive.

The donated clothing was used in creating all nine of her innovative designs. The remaining plans included building the stage and backdrop, recruiting models and choreographing the fashion show soundtrack. This was accomplished with the help of over 80 students. The fashion show was an entertaining and lively display of sophisticated urban visual curiosities, with outfits composed of non-traditional materials man body. The exuberant body presence of each model served to electrify the enthusiastic audience as each strutted down the runway. The models reciprocally fed off of the audience as they demonstrated the creative genius of Sopic in each of her nine unique conceptions.

"I thought the audience added the perfect amount of energy and spirit to the show. When the models walked off the stage they all said 'That was so fun! The audience doesn't stop clapping and cheering!'" Sopic said.

Sopic's zeal for fashion has been unmistakable ever since she was young. She worked for Donna Karan in New York City throughout high school. When she came to Bucknell, she realized that her dreams were manifested in fashion. She didn't let the lack of a Fashion Design major deter her dreams.

Sopic designed her own major in Design Management by combining the Art, Theater, and Management majors in order to create her own curriculum.

In order to get her curriculum choices approved, she was required to write a proposal regarding the unacceptability of any present Bucknell majors for her desired studies. She also had to propose a senior project to conclude her studies in this major, and she chose to create a

New fire safety bill passed

By Laura Day

After the tragic fires at Seton Hall University and Bloomsburg University last year, fire prevention has been a major topic of discussion in the Pennsylvania Legislature.

These devastating fires that killed college students have alerted public safety, said, "I think that the concept of installing or retrofitting fire sprinklers in college residential facilities has merit, but I don't know that it has been well thought out or that it is practical or wholly effective for the purpose intended. The costs may be monumentally prohibitive and the results less than desirable."

safety program," said DeCercchio.

The bill also provides a "sprinkler loan program" that would give low-interest loans to the public and private colleges for installation. The total appropriation in the bill is $100 million. It is estimated that for state universities, the cost of installing the sprinklers would be between $75 and $100 per student. The state system estimates that the costs for installation of sprinklers in all facilities would be $88 million. However, the bill must pass the Senate before it can take effect.

President Steffen Rogers said, "I applaud anything that will save even one student's life. I believe that the heart of the Pennsylvania Legislature is in the right place."

Also emphasized the importance of having a fire expert analyze the practicality of sprinklers as an effective way to save lives.

Since fire and smoke can spread through an entire hallway within 3-5 minutes, it is crucial that students evacuate the building as soon as an alarm is activated.

Whether the University will be forced to install sprinklers in every dorm is yet to be decided, but fire safety is an everyday concern. DeCercchio emphasizes the importance of abiding by fire evacuation procedures.

"If a campus experiences fire alarms 100 times in a year and 99 of these alarms are false, but one is real, are you willing to gamble with your life on these odds?" DeCercchio said. "When you do not evacuate a building during a fire alarm, you are gambling with your life."

Incidents like the fires at Seton Hall University and Bloomsburg University (above) caused wide-spread national concern for fire safety in college and university residences.

many to the serious dangers associated with negligence of fire codes and regulations and the importance of observing established evacuation procedures.

Recently, the Dormitory Sprinkler Installation Bill (HB 2458) passed the House in the PA Legislature.

Introduced by Representative Michael McGeehan, the bill would require dormitories in public and private institutions of higher education to be equipped with an automatic sprinkler system no later than five years from the effective date of the act.

This bill, which impacts the University, has generated various discussions regarding the practicality of such regulations.

Vince DeCercchio, director of Fire safety is indeed an important issue on all college campuses. The United States has the highest incidence of fire deaths in the world, and a significant amount occurs on college campuses. Most deaths due to fires result from either a failure of an early warning system, such as smoke detectors, or a failure of residents to heed the alarms and evacuate the building.

"Although cost should never be an obstacle when we can save lives, statistics have shown us that people who die in residential fires succumb to smoke inhalation long before the flames of the fire activate the fire sprinklers. Early detection, early warnings systems, timely evacuations, an aggressive fire safety education program and fire drills are the keys to an effective campus fire

Bucknell Brigade to host barn dance

By Peter Van Emburgh

The Bucknell Brigade to Nicaragua is holding a Barn Dance to raise needed funds to support the Brigade's annual trip to Nueva Vida.

The event will be held Sat. Oct. 21 from 8 p.m. to 12 a.m. in nearby Windfield. The Bucknell bus will depart from Downhill LC starting at 7:45 p.m. and will return to the campus beginning at 10:30 p.m.

"Our hope is that this fundraiser will educate the campus and local community about the Brigade while also giving everybody a chance to support an important cause," said Deirdre O'Connor, writing and teaching consultant for the writing center. "It's a chance to come together to have fun and support an important cause."

The Barn Dance will be held in former Associate Dean of the College of Engineering Trudy Cunningham's barn 10 minutes from Lewisburg. The band "Back Up and Push" will be performing as well as the ProMix DJ.

"Back Up and Push" features a few familiar faces at the University: Professor of Geology Carl Kirby, Professor of English Bob Taylor and Sue Taylor, who until recently worked for the Art Department. The Residential Colleges and The Bucknell Dining Service are also supporting the operations of the dance.

Nueva Vida is a resettlement community of 14,000 impoverished peopled whose former homes were destroyed by Hurricane Mitch in Oct. 1998.

Three Bucknell Brigades have since traveled to Nicaragua to aid relief efforts and to help build a health clinic open to all residents of Nueva Vida. Generous contributions from the local community have totaled more than $40,000, but there is still much work to be done, according to the Brigade.

"The Brigade members hope that what promises to be something different," O'Connor said. "Most people have never been to a barn dance, after all!"

Zimbabwe forces skirmish with food rioters for 3rd day

HARARE, Zimbabwe (AP) — Police and troops skirmished with protesters Wednesday and conducted house-to-house searches as food riots in Zimbabwe's capital went on for a third day. Police fired tear gas into homes and stopped taxi vans ferrying commuters from the Kuwadzana township into the center of Harare. Demonstrators blocked the main westbound highway out of the city soon after dawn, but police dispersed them with tear gas and removed the barricade. A dozen soldiers also attacked four foreign journalists Wednesday in the western Harare township of Dzivarasekwa.

MANILA, Philippines — A bloc of Filipino opposition members today filed impeachment charges against Philippine President Joseph Estrada, who has been accused of taking payoffs from gambling lords. While the action was the first step by opposition members to try to force Estrada from office, the legislators acknowledged it would be difficult to get the impeachment charges passed through Congress.

Nigerian police struggle to disperse rioters in ethnic violence

LAGOS, Nigeria — Paramilitary police fired in the air on Wednesday to disperse rioters in the main business district of Lagos, Nigeria's biggest city, as ethnic clashes that have claimed over 100 lives continued to spread. Bigger Social Security cost-of-living raise coming in 2001

WASHINGTON — The 45.2 million Americans getting Social Security checks will see them grow by 3.5 percent next year, the biggest cost-of-living increase in almost a decade. That's because inflation has picked up speed, almost entirely a reflection of surging energy prices. The increases, which will begin showing up in benefit payments for January, were announced by Social Security based on inflation figures released Wednesday by the Labor Department.

University promotes alcohol awareness

By Natalie Casp

Colleges and universities across the country are observing National Alcohol Awareness Week by challenging students to abstain from drinking alcohol Tuesday through Friday. The University's GAMMA chapter organized several alcohol-free programs to promote this year's Alcohol Awareness week.

Sarah Glover, GAMMA chair, began coordinating events for the entire student body last April.

"Everything basically solidified about a month ago, but we made the arrangements for Tuesday night's speaker in April," Glover said.

David Hellstrom spoke to members of Greek organizations Tuesday evening in the Weis center. His presentation, Eddy Talks: The Comedy and Drama of a Problem Drinker, addressed the realities of alcohol abuse in a straightforward, yet comedic, manner.

"He held the audience's attention and acknowledged some of the problems college students encounter in certain social situations," Kate Kenner '03 said.

Wednesday evening, students heard a sobering presentation from emergency room nurses George Rittle RN, team coordinator of emergency medicine at Geisinger Medical Center, and Chris Wargo RN, trauma coordinator at Geisinger Medical Center.

"The presenters addressed alcohol's impact on the ER and the overall impact alcohol use has on emergency services and individuals," Coordinator of Alcohol and Other Drug Programs Bob Thomas said.

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro acknowledges the importance of addressing medical care as it related to alcohol.

"Yes, there is a certain doom and gloom associated with the emergency room, but occasionally we run into a few incidents that require medical treatment for alcohol abuse," Ferraro said.

Greek members are also organizing several alcohol-free events open to the entire campus community.

"This is National Alcohol Awareness week—not just Greek Alcohol Awareness week—I'm pretty pleased that our Greeks are taking the lead and developing this program for our student body; this is not exclusively for the Greeks at all," Dean of Greek Life Roy Baker said.

Thursday night, the GAMMA representatives from each Greek chapter will serve a non-alcoholic cocktail at the "mocktail reception" at 7 p.m. in the Terrace Room.

"Each fraternity and sorority came up with a mocktail for the GAMMA rep to serve at the event. It was a success last year, so we're trying to expand it this year by offering food and entertainment," Glover said.

The comedy improv troupe, We Brake for Nobody, will perform from 7:30 to 8:30 p.m. in the Terrace Room at the mocktail party.

Brad Tufts, former associate di-

Chris Wargo (above) and George Rittle shared their experiences as ER nurses at Geisinger Medical Center with students. Both Rittle and Wargo expressed the need for more alcohol awareness.

To show that students can still enjoy a social evening without alcohol, Chi Phi fraternity is hosting an alcohol-free party Friday night. Ferraro supports such student-organized parties.

"This is a really good idea—Delta Upsilon had a wonderful alcohol-free party and I think students will enjoy themselves at Chi Phi," Ferraro said.

"I want the students to show that we control alcohol and it doesn't control us," Ferraro said.

"There are two issues surrounding the topic of alcohol: respecting abstinence and thinking about what moderation means," Ferraro said.

"These are tough and serious issues; students need to look out for each other and respect the decisions of their friends."

Ferraro urges students to take a Member of campus family dies suddenly

By Rachel Laskow

After decades of being a part of University athletics, Bob Pangburn, 68, passed away unexpectedly on Thursday, Oct. 12.

Pangburn first came to the University in 1950 and began working as equipment manager for the football team. During his time at the university, he also worked with the baseball team by serving as manager for 34 years, traveling with the team and taking care of equipment.

Although he formally retired in 1994, Pangburn came back as a scorekeeper for the baseball team.

"Bobby was a very positive person—I don't know of anyone who disliked him," Baseball Coach Gene Depew said. "He made people smile and really added to the program. He is the common denominator of all athletes who went through here."

Head Football Coach Tom Gadd said, "He was a great friend of every athlete that came through Bucknell. He made a small town special. He rode his bicycle everywhere—he is part of living in Lewisburg."

"He loved [the University] more than anyone I've come across here."

—Jenny Cruickshank

Pangburn was a lifelong

Lewisburg resident. His dedication to the University and the Lewisburg borough was apparent to all.

"His loyalty to Bucknell and to the athletics program grew from a very special attachment that his late father, a team physician and Trustee, had to the University," Tufts said.

A funeral for Pangburn was held on Tuesday in the Rpkoe Chapel.

Matthew Albert

Major: Computer Science Engineering

Hailing from Pittsburgh, Matt Albert has involved himself with many campus activities. Albert is currently on the staff of The Bucknellian and has been an RA since his sophomore year. Albert has also worked for WVBU and Information Services Resources. In addition to these many organizations, Albert has also had to meet the demands of a full-time engineering schedule.

Despite these sometimes taxing commitments, Albert has nothing but fond memories of his time spent at the University.

"The best feeling I have about Bucknell is when I'm coming home from Dana at 2:30 in the morning and standing alone in the middle of the academic quad," Albert said. "The mixture of exhaustion and absolute quiet seem to bring on all the memories of my four years; definitely the best four years of my life."

Once these four fabulous years come to an end, Albert hopes to put his engineering degree to good use with a career in the technology industry.

Until then, however, Albert is going to enjoy his remaining time to the fullest, adding Homecoming Host to his list of memories.

"I am excited and nervous since I am with some esteemed company. I hope I can represent the class of '01 well," Albert said modestly.

"I just want to wish everyone good luck and good times in the future."

Keiko Martina Kurokawa

Major: International Relations with a concentration in Europe and business
Minor: French

"I am flattered and honored to have been selected as a hostess," Kurokawa said happily. "I am excited to be a part of a select group representing the Bucknell community."

And represent it Kurokawa does, not only in her appointment as hostess, but in the many facets of her student and personal life. Kurokawa has been a member of International Spectrum, Alpha Chi Omega Fraternity, Students for Asian Awareness Bucknell, International Student Advisory Board Committee and has worked as an Institute for Leadership and Technology in Management coordinator.

Kurokawa is of Italian and Japanese heritage and currently lives in Frankfurt, Germany.

"As an international student in this campus, I have seen it change a lot," Kurokawa said. "I believe that the campus has become more diverse and I am glad to see an increase in the number of students at Bucknell who are minorities and from abroad."

After graduation, Kurokawa plans to use her language and international studies backgrounds to secure a job in advertising and marketing for a global company. She also plans to attend graduate school after earning some practical job experience.

However far her global aspirations will take her, Kurokawa will always look back fondly on her time here at the University.

"The friendships I have established here are something I will always treasure."

Kurokawa also credits her work as a peer consultant, the Career Development Center marketing specialist and management TA as helping to prepare her for life after school.

Chris Halldorson

Major: Math and Music
Minor: British Literature

The talented leader of the Bison Chips said he was "surprised" when he was announced as a Homecoming Host.

While many will remember Chris as the singer of "Lady in Red" at the annual Christy's event, Halldorson also participates in Chapel Choir and Chorale, leading the tenor section. He is also a former member of the opera company.

"Bucknell has been a time of growth for me," Halldorson remembers.

"I'd like to think that I've changed a lot from the timid freshman who just wanted to go home."

Halldorson has no concrete plans for after graduation, although he knows that whatever it is that he does will probably not be any where near as crazy as the experiences he had here.

"I'll always remember running around campus half naked for the Chipfest video; somehow I don't think I'll get away with that in the real world."

For the remainder of his time here Halldorson will be making time to participate in the activities that he loves for the last few times. This includes the Bison Chips 25 Year Reunion Concert at 8 p.m. on Saturday, Oct. 28.

Nyambi Nyambi

Major: Business Management
Minor: Theater

For the person ranked by ESPN Magazine as having the third best name in the country (after Reggie Rambo and Majestic Mapp), being named Homecoming Host may not seem like that big of a deal.

It was for Nyambi.

"To be nominated was incredible because it meant someone felt I made some type of difference on campus," Nyambi said. "It was totally unexpected."

A member of the varsity men's basketball team, Nyambi also used his love of the game to counsel children through the 1 on 1 Sports program. Nyambi is also involved with National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and BASE.

After graduation, Nyambi plans to pursue a career in marketing but ultimately plans on pursuing a career in front of the camera.

As evidenced by these two different career aspirations, Nyambi is a man of many talents; he is a motivational speaker, writes poetry, is a comedian and draws.

Perhaps the achievement he is most proud of is his work in starting the "Sixth Man" and then "The Herd" basketball spirit squads.

"Hopefully these groups will continue to grow and will continue after I graduate," Nyambi said. "They bring the Bucknell/Lewisburg community together for at least two to three hours."

Cheryl Brooks-Williams

Major: Management/Economics
Minor: Pre-Law

Many students who travel as far to school as Brooks-Williams does (she is from Bloomington, Minnesota) would have trouble adjusting. Brooks-Williams has instead flourished, involving herself with a multitude of campus organizations.

As an active member of Activities and Campus Events, Student Alumni Association, Lead Team, Band, Pep Band, Mortar Board, L'Agenda, Kappa Alpha Theta Fraternity, Delta Mu Delta, Burma Cultural Group, Concert Committee, Committee on Admissions and Financial Aid, Bucknell Business Leaders and the Catholic Campus Ministry, it is a wonder she is successfully pursuing such a demanding major.

"My years at Bucknell have been incredible," Brooks-Williams said. "Bucknell has given me a great opportunity to learn and to grow."

This growth is made apparent by her selection as a hostess.

"I was very excited and proud that students and faculty feel that I have contributed to Bucknell and that I would represent the student body well."

Bucknell Campaign, the largest fundraising effort in University history, will reach its completion in December. No new fundraising campaign is planned, but Pollock believes that other options exist; he sees "a whole population of prospective donors that is untapped." Pollock believes that many alumni and potential supporters will step up contributions for such a major cause.

Sweeney believes that the University can learn from other schools' scholarship programs he noted Duke, Stanford, Rice and Northwestern as universities with successful merit aid structures. "There are models out there that we can learn from. These types of schools have shown that they don't give merit aid to student-athletes at the expense of other students," Sweeney said.

Pollock said a key aspect will be using financial aid strategically. He said that financial aid was instituted at the University so that Bucknell wasn't financially out of reach for anyone. "We have to be strategic and make sure that we don't choke off that access. That would be simply unstrategic."

Pollock anticipates continued communication between the faculty and administration over the scholarship issue. "We've begun to sketch out what the implications could be, but it's difficult since there's no definite plan at the conference level yet," he said.

Sweeney echoed Pollock's sentiments: "The discussion could be emotionally charged but doesn't have to be. We all need to apply some patience and objectivity and learn what the cost-benefits can be."

After graduation, Brooks-Williams plans to attend law school and become a lawyer. It is obvious by her dedication to the University, however, that she will miss her undergraduate alma mater.

"My years here at Bucknell have been incredible."

Cy Rubel

Major: Business Management
Minor: Economics

A true Bucknellian, Rubel describes herself as proud "future graduate of the University."

"After hearing I was going to be a hostess, I was mostly surprised," Rubel said. "I was flattered by the support of the student body and that of my friends. Above all else I am proud to represent the senior class."

Rubel has shown this pride through the many activities she is involved with on campus. Coming all the way from Prescott, AZ, Rubel is an RA, member of the club volleyball team and member of Delta Mu Delta. Rubel also works in the Small Business Center and is the Vice President of Delta Gamma fraternity. Rubel also served one year in Bucknell Student Government.

Looking to put her degree to good use, Rubel is currently looking for a job and is pleased with how her search is going. She credits the University for her success.

"Bucknell has provided me with the chance to grow as a person academically as well as emotionally," Rubel said. "I have made some great friends and will be taking many wonderful memories away with me."

Brooke Bader

Major: Psychology

As a future optometrist, it is a credit to her dedication that Bader has been able to keep her calendar so full and still keep her eye on medical school.

As a co-captain of the varsity volleyball team as well as a member of the JV basketball team, Delta Gamma sorority and the Rooke Chapel congregation, Bader has seemingly done it all.

A native of Elyria, Ohio, Bader deems the volleyball team's appearance in the NCAA tournament as the most memorable moment of her Bucknell career. She also recognizes the many friends she made in her four years here as "wonderful" people.

"I am honored to have been named as a homecoming hostess," Bader said proudly.

Yusef Maisami

Major: Management
Minor: Economics

Certainly a visible presence on campus, Yusuf "Yoshi" Maisami still describes "an overwhelming feeling of joy" at being named a homecoming host.

"It truly is an honor to represent Bucknell and to be part of the Bucknell family," Maisami said. "I'm looking forward to the Class of 2001 reunion years."

After graduation he plans to work at eMarket Capital, an Internet start-up company in King of Prussia, Pa., moving from his native Towson, MD.

The founders of the company are Bucknell alum and Maisami relishes the opportunity to work with fellow Bucknell grads.

"I interned with eMarket Capital over the summer, and accepted their job offer in mid-August," Maisami said. "Both of them participated in the eLeaders conference last week."

Participation is a theme that has run through Maisami's university career; as the Bucknell Student Government president, member of the presidential search committee, Class of 2001 president, Building on Foundations assistant, cheerleader, residence hall assistant, Institute for Leadership and Management in Technology assistant and brother at Phi Gamma Delta fraternity, Maisami has kept himself busy.

Yet through all of this activity, Maisami has made time to appreciate the little things:

"One of my fondest memories is of the thoughts I have walking to class in the mornings from Fiji to Taylor," Maisami said. "I love that little path up the hill, and I will miss it after graduation. Now that the leaves have turned I realize that every time I walk that path I will be one step closer to leaving this place we call home."

Maisami plans to return to university life, hopefully earning his MBA from Stanford University.

ty in past years. Students currently holding residence in the borough must now face the repercussions.

"You're suffering the history of students past," Johnson said. "You can blame the five or six classes in front of you who have built up a disrespect for the community."

The current goal of the Lewisburg police, according to Nietz, is to stop the complaints, a goal he does not feel is realistic. But if off-campus activity is not controlled, students will face more severe restrictions.

"I know of two ordinances on the table right now that may be passed and that are really going to restrict the activity down there," Nietz said.

Students said that many residences were making an effort towards controlling their parties. Ferraro added that when students are taking appropriate measures such as having a party list and insulating their house to lower the noise heard by neighbors and are receiving citations at 10:45 p.m. on a Friday anyway, it becomes hard for them to determine appropriate actions.

"I think students are searching to make the distinction between being respectful and trying to have a social life," Ferraro said.

Johnson and Nietz indicated that the means for students to improve relations now is to moderate the activity in the borough.

"I don't know how to explain it more clearly," Johnson said. "We want you to control your houses."

Sprinkler bill all washed up

The Pennsylvania state legislature recently passed the Dormitory Sprinkler Installation Bill, which will require all public and private institutions in the state to install fire sprinklers in residential facilities.

The addition of sprinkler systems may make more students comfortable in their residence halls, but it might make them too comfortable—students frequently avoid fire drills in dorms, and with the added security of sprinkler systems, many more will ignore fire alarms and be reluctant to heed the early warning system.

Most deaths are caused by failure of warning systems like alarms and smoke detectors, while others are caused by simple apathy.

Statistics work against us in this situation. A fire can spread through a hallway in three to five minutes, leaving residents with almost no time to get out before being detected. Sprinklers may not even have the chance to save lives: people are often debilitated by smoke inhalation long before the fire reaches their room. Thus, sprinklers may help put out the fire, but they will not help save a life.

Bottom line: Sprinklers don't save lives—they save buildings. The bill also provides a sprinkler loan program with a total appropriation of $100 million, though state schools will require most of the funding, estimating a cost of $88 million for installation in all facilities. An abundance of private institutions in Pennsylvania may leave the University to fight for a matter of dollars.

Economics work against us in this situation. While the state legislature's actions are clearly commendable, they may have acted too strongly on emotions and not enough on logic. Further preventative measures are needed to make sure that Seton Hall or Bloomsburg don't happen again. The University should uphold an obligation to ensure the efficiency of each building's early warning systems and take greater measures to reduce student apathy in evacuations.

Roberts Hall has a long history of false alarms. Students in the dorm normalize the alarms, often staying in their rooms during evacuations. If this trend continues, it will become more and more difficult to motivate these students to respond to alarms.

The University acknowledges this trend of normalization but should do more to reverse it. The Bucknellian believes that more can be done to ensure safety for all students and not just for the facilities.

Is Uptown a viable source of on campus entertainment for students?

Yes

By Heather Napolitano

Since its grand opening last January, the University's non-alcoholic facility Uptown has been subject to close student scrutiny. But despite consequent struggles with poor attendance, Uptown remains an integral component of the Bucknell campus.

The venue is a unique feature of the University. With a nightclub atmosphere, it is the only location on campus dedicated solely to creating a weekend social scene for students. There must be a social option where students can be assured an alcohol-free environment, particularly for the majority of students who are under 21 years of age.

Meanwhile, administration constantly emphasizes that students should not rely on alcohol consumption as a social activity. The creation of this facility increases the likelihood that students will eventually heed to their urges and refrain from drinking.

With the recent crack-down on parties in the borough and the decline in the number of registered fraternity parties, Uptown also provides a location where students can congregate socially on any given Friday or Saturday night. The facility further removes the possibility of students facing issues with police and public safety and receiving costly violations.

A closer look at Uptown reveals that it is a very impressive facility. It boasts some excellent features including a dance floor with a coordinated light and sound system, a game room containing pool tables and television sets and a bar with a variety of non-alcoholic "mocktails" and snacks.

Uptown also draws a range of entertainment including such bands as Pat McGee, Brothers Greagan, Jimmie's Chicken Shack, Harvey Danger and, most recently, SR-71.

These bands have a significant student following, and if students have further suggestions for improvement perhaps they could be made to the University. Uptown is dedicated to students and should therefore be tailored to their interests.

But the fate remains in students' hands. If they begin to recognize this as a viable social option and choose take advantage of it, Uptown could have a bright future.

No

By Jim Leahy

What's wrong with Uptown many people ask? Well, everything! Much has been made of the University's plan to provide non-alcoholic entertainment for students but after a semester and a half, many have come to the realization that Uptown is not all it's hyped up to be. Students are not going in droves and the place goes virtually empty most of the time.

The bands that have appeared at Uptown are the only shining star in a dark sky. Pat McGee, Jimmie's Chicken Shack and SR71 are big name bands. The Brothers Cregan included a member of the widely popular Barenaked Ladies. But that is where the accomplishments end.

But what really is the problem with the place? I have heard many complaints but there seem to be only three that come up all the time.

First, the place is too small. It can only accommodate a certain number of students before taking on the properties of a sardine can.

The main dance floor is smaller than many dorm rooms on campus and there is no way to play pool comfortably without someone bumping into your cue and ruining the crucial shot.

Then there is the issue of hours. Uptown is open on Friday and Saturday from 9 p.m. to 3 a.m. Well, that is, by my calculations, only 12 hours a week.

But there are 168 hours in a week and it just sits empty and dark for most of them. Why not open it up during the day as a place for students to go and hang out. They could go and play pool, get a snack, watch TV, or listen to music. Then the exiles in Swartz and the New Dorm would have something to do that is actually close to where they live.

And finally, the complaint amongst upperclassmen is that the place is only for first-year students. And that seems to be partially true. The students frequenting the place are usually first-years who don't have anything better to do with their weekend.

The moral of this story? Uptown has cost the University more money than the crowds justify. It needs mass appeal and a license to stay open longer to allow more students to find time to go.

An alternative application of a college degree

By David McGreevy

I guess at this point in my college career I should be looking into some sort of an internship or apprenticeship or something.

It may be the case that it takes more than a philosophy degree, an encyclopedic knowledge of old Thunder Cats episodes and a pretty face to bring in the big bucks.

As I look around I see great opportunities in marketing and publishing and engineering and such, but none of these things really interest me because honestly the only thing I've ever really wanted to do with my life is be a hobo.

The origin of this, I suppose, is not any sort of childhood trauma but just another bit of smart-aleckery used to compensate for poor football-playing skills.

A teacher or guidance counselor or janitor or whatever would ask me what I wanted to be "when I grew up," and I, eager to avoid any tedious thinking, fired back that I would like to be a hobo, or, failing that, a Go-Bot.

If you say these things enough (and I certainly did) you start to believe them. Over the next five years or so I came to the realization that maybe I really did want to be a hobo. Hoboes get to ride trains and frighten children and eat out of a can.

Unfortunately the same can't usually be said of a Regional Sales Manager or an Executive Vice President. Given the choice between eating out of a can and taking home six figures, I will undoubtedly always choose the former.

I wonder if the other hoboes would accept me. The giveaway, I guess, is when they give you a nickname. If all of a sudden the hoboes started calling me "Box-car Davy" or "Hobo Dave" or

I have a lot of skills that would really help the group. I know how to cook soup. I know what plants are safe to eat. I have a harmonica. Hoboes value such things.

In exchange, maybe they could teach me about hobo stew, boot eating and the ways of the mountain. Perhaps we could start a jug band.

Please, do not tell the hoboes about my asthma.

I guess there might be some tough things about the life of the merry hobo. I don't think hoboes get to shower very often, and it would be hard to check my email.

Actually, I would probably make a pretty terrible hobo. But the lure of the rails is powerful indeed.

Sometimes I am up late at night writing some ridiculous paper, and I have to wake up early the next day to make it to yet another class, and I can hear the train going by outside.

It's just down the hill from here. I could grab my toothbrush and a pack of gum and be halfway to St. Louis before anybody knew I was missing. Times like that I think that it can really get hard.

OPINIONS

Are we slaves to technology?

By Matthew Hinson

Technology. Mention this to most people and right away they will speak of computers, satellites and the Internet. Yet humans have been using "technology" ever since the beginning of time.

The first time a human picked up a stick and threw it to kill something to eat, mankind has been using technology. Yet today, we speak of "higher" technology, and we seem to be bombarded by it daily. The question is, where will it take us?

Cell phones, laptops, the Internet, cars, airplanes, the light bulb—all of these dominate our lives and all are relatively modern inventions.

Year after year, more new technologies are developed and thrown into the market for mass consumption. Some catch on, some die, but one thing is certain: humanity is becoming more and more dependent upon these higher forms of technology, for better or for worse.

Granted, some good things happen when we allow technology to do things for us. We can, due to electricity, work long past sunset; we can travel great distances in short periods of time, and we can cheaply be entertained through the mass production of books, films and music.

Great advances have been made through medicine, saving countless lives from what would have been, without technological breakthroughs, certain death.

Yet, sometimes it seems that technology deprives us of some basic forms of interaction which are inherently human, both with humans and with the world around us.

Today, many children sit for hours in front of a television or computer screen when, fifty years ago, they would be out making friends, playing ball or just running around.

Perhaps in the new age in which we find ourselves, our interactions are defined through technology. But somehow it seems to make less sense for kids to learn everything they know by passively absorbing it electronically than by experiencing life themselves.

As for adults, technology is supposed to make our lives simpler, give us more free time. Yet how many people would say that their lives are any less stressful or busy for all the technology they have? Technology does enable the human world to move faster, especially in the areas of information and business, but it does not really eliminate any work, rather, it creates it.

And really, when speaking of the "highest" forms of technology we have today, namely the computer and its related devices, are they so user friendly as to warrant their omnipresence? Whenever Windows crashes, or something similar goes wrong, can the average user fix it? Isn't technology supposed to make our lives easier?

I am not for the abolition of technology whatsoever. I say merely this: this generation, the first really to grow up with the "modern" technologies being as popular as they are, we must make sure that we develop technologies around humans, as opposed to making humanity change its ways to suit the technology.

In our race for higher technology and easier lives, we must not forget the simple pleasures afforded by the non-technological, for these are the basic experiences by which humanity must define itself, if we are not to become mechanical animals.

The punishment doesn't fit the crime

By Allyson Demerath

When I initially learned at a fairly young age that inmates on death row could die from lethal injection, I was horrified. I simply could not believe our democratic country would tolerate such an act. I questioned the humanity of it. I wondered why more efforts were not being made to rehabilitate these people. Surely they could benefit from psychological help. If these prisoners were given a chance to voice their side of the story and perhaps seek counseling, I did not feel they could ever deserve to die.

Then I grew up. I learned about the types of crimes these people had performed. If I thought I was horrified before, it was nothing compared to the emotions I felt now. The hideous, revolting, unforgivable crimes committed in our society astound me. Just reading some of these makes me physically ill. I cannot imagine what the family members of the victim must be enduring.

Many believe in "an eye for an eye" and "a tooth for a tooth." These same people claim that the death penalty should be strictly enforced. They justify it by saying that if a person took someone else's life, that person deserves to die. I claim that we as a society should think about the methods any given perpetrator used to kill another person. What happened before the victim died? Was he or she raped, tortured or terrorized? Did the person suffer extreme pain during their last moments of life? How exactly did he/she die?

In most of the cases on death row, the perpetrator used extremely cruel and malicious tactics for killing their victims. Yet, we as a society dictate that some of these prisoners should die through lethal injection. Unlike their victims who were left wondering until their final moments, these inmates have the luxury of knowing they will die in a brief period of time with little pain.

I support the death penalty. While I feel it provides the end result—death of the perpetrator—I also feel it is merited in comparison to the crimes these people committed. If I were the family member of a young girl who was raped and murdered or a middle-aged man who was subjected to extreme torture before his final inevitable death, I would want a more extreme punishment. I would want these perpetrators to suffer the same fate as my family member.

This may sound like an irrational reaction. Many may think that I have trouble letting go of my anger or that I am obsessed with revenge. As long as America has citizens committing terrifying crimes, I think the death penalty is a necessary aspect of our society. Some may argue we as a society do not have the right to take another person's life. To those people I pose this question: Did they have the right to take the life of their victim?

How did this unfair position fall upon the District of Columbia? In 1801, when the government created the federal district, it ceded parts of Maryland and Virginia for its seat and thus the citizens within that area lost their right to vote in congressional elections in their home states. Eventually, the land that was originally part of Virginia was given back to that state, regaining a congressional vote for its citizens.

However, the citizens in what remained of the District were not given true representation in Congress. In addition, the District of Columbia, because it lacked state status, was not allowed to vote in presidential elections until 1960.

Recently, Bucknell students and faculty received an email from "Students for Peace in the Middle East." The mail contained very disturbing photos of a Palestinian boy and his father being shot at in one of many skirmishes taking place right now. The boy was killed.

It is a tragedy that people are hurt and killed daily in this struggle. It is always bad news when people are hurt or die in conflict. I have no intention of making light of that family's grief.

What I do find disturbing about the email we all got is what was not in it. It was carefully worded, to avoid any attack, but it was anti-Israeli propaganda posing as concern for human life. There was no picture of Palestinians firing guns and throwing rocks, though if you look at the front page of the New York Times, you'll see that. There was no mention of Israeli losses, of the Middle East "show their true intent to create the feeling at Bucknell, a place where Israel doesn't have much of a voice, that the Palestinians and only the Palestinians are suffering needlessly in the Middle East. And the guilty party? Israel, of course. I am tired of having to sit quietly and accept this notion. It is impossible to look at that terrible, irrevocable situation and blame only one side. And it is certainly easy to pass judgment and choose up sides while sitting comfortably on an expensive college campus in the United States.

I ask that we all reflect on the point from which we consider this conflict. And I ask that we have concern for all human life, not just some.

Bloodshed in the Middle East

By Amanda Kaufman

More than 100 people have died in clashes on the West Bank and Gaza over the past few weeks. All but seven of the dead were Palestinians.

The violence exploded after a Sept. 28 visit by a hardline Israeli politician to a Jerusalem shrine holy to Jews and Muslims. It has been a month since the Sept. 13 deadline that Israel and the Palestinians had set for achieving a permanent peace accord and settling all the contentious issues between them. In that month, a negotiating stalemate deteriorated into the most severe violence there in years, threatening the accomplishments of seven years of peacemaking and the very concept of peace itself. Israel has slapped a closure on the West Bank, preventing Palestinians from leaving their communities. In Hebron, an added internal closure has kept thousands of Palestinians, who live in close proximity to a handful of Jewish settlers, from even leaving their homes. All of this is occurring just three months after a 15-day summit meeting at Camp David failed in its goal of producing an accord.

Current meetings have been equally unfruitful. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat met Monday at an emergency summit brokered by President Clinton in an effort to end bloodshed in the region, but expectations for the summit were low on all sides. Several informal cease-fires to end the unrest have collapsed so far and marathon meetings Oct. 4 in Paris failed to get the leaders to come to terms on a truce. Monday's meeting, hosted by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak at the Red Sea resort of Sharm El-Sheikh, also included King Abdullah of Jordan, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign affairs chief. The foreign ministers and Palestinian officials trying to draft a joint statement made little headway, an Israeli official said. Acting Israeli Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami had rejected Egyptian and Palestinian formulations that would have blamed Israel. The Israeli official said the meeting had adjourned abruptly, but that the participants agreed to reconvene later. Barak was the first to arrive and immediately started a meeting with Mubarak. Barak told Mubarak that they would not pull back Israeli forces or reopen Palestinian areas until Arafat re-arrests dozens of Hamas militants recently released from Palestinian jails and tells security forces to stop shooting and participating in street rioting. Arafat planned a separate meeting with Mubarak as well.

The world is holding its collective breath as these peace talks proceed. All are wondering what will happen if there is no progress. President Clinton said, "What has happened in these last few weeks reminds us of the terrible alternative to continuing to live in peace and to continue in the peace process."

Saeb Erekat, an Arafat aide, predicted that if the summit fails, "all hell will break loose." Doubtful that wounds from weeks of violence could have been healed at Monday's crucial summit, many on both sides think their leaders should have stayed home. "So many times we have gone to summits and signed agreements with the Palestinians that are not worth the paper they are written on, so what good will another summit do?" Rabbi Elyakim Levonson asked. He said Israel instead should disarm Palestinian police who can no longer be trusted with the weapons they were given as part of earlier peace deals. Palestinians are equally unconfident about the potential of the peace talks. "The struggle is not going to end with the summit or with words. It's just the beginning because now we are facing our destiny," Nader Jabari, a 41-year-old Palestinian who lives in Hebron, West Bank, declared. He referred to the United States as "the devil," adding that the Palestinians will not settle for less than their own state. Some Palestinians condemn the summit meeting as a move to quash what they see as their war of independence. Most are skeptical.

Many in the United States are wondering if it is our place to host and mediate these summits. When asked about the necessity of US involvement, President Clinton responded, "We must do so because we have a profound national interest in peace in the Middle East and a very special bond to the state of Israel."

The presidential candidates, Vice President Al Gore and Texas Governor George W. Bush, welcomed the news of the Middle East meeting. Gore said he was praying for the success of Monday's meeting. "I think that we need a lot of prayers to make sure that meeting is a success," Bush issued a statement from his ranch in Texas: "I welcome this development. I hope that Chairman Arafat and Prime Minister Barak will do everything possible to stop the violence so that our long-standing goal of peace in the Middle East can be achieved."

Revealing the bald spot

By Tim Scheu

What do you think about health care? "I'd like to start by saying how happy I am to be here..." What do you think about public school vouchers? "I'd like to take this opportunity to share my vision..." Why is it that Americans don't trust politicians? "First of all Jim, I would like to respond to what the governor just said..."

In the third debate on Tuesday night Gore demonstrated that he has the flexibility of an iron rod. Time after time, members of the audience would ask him questions only to hear the Vice-President ramble off on his own agenda.

If Al Gore loses this election to George W. Bush it won't be because he is the less learned of the two, and it won't be because of his policy. It will be because of the way he comes across to the American public. Just as a bald spot ruins an otherwise solid head of hair, Gore's public image will taint an honorable resume.

Many are quick to cite that Gore comes across as more knowledgeable, but at what price? Aside from the aggressive, interruptive personality he was so criticized for in the first debates, he has overextended himself by quoting what Bush called "fuzzy numbers."

According to The Washington Post, Gore's miscalculation in the first debate was one of only several half-truths cited by the democratic nominee. In criticizing Bush's education plan, Gore has repeatedly stated that the governor's plan relies more on the money stripped from the public school system (in the form of vouchers) than federal spending. While something like this could feasibly happen, that is only if every child offered vouchers accepts them. The reality of the situation is somewhat different.

In addition, Gore has bragged that he headed the "re-invention" of government initiative, which downsized the federal government by nearly 300,000 people. What he doesn't say is that two-thirds of those employees were military personnel laid off at the end of the cold war.

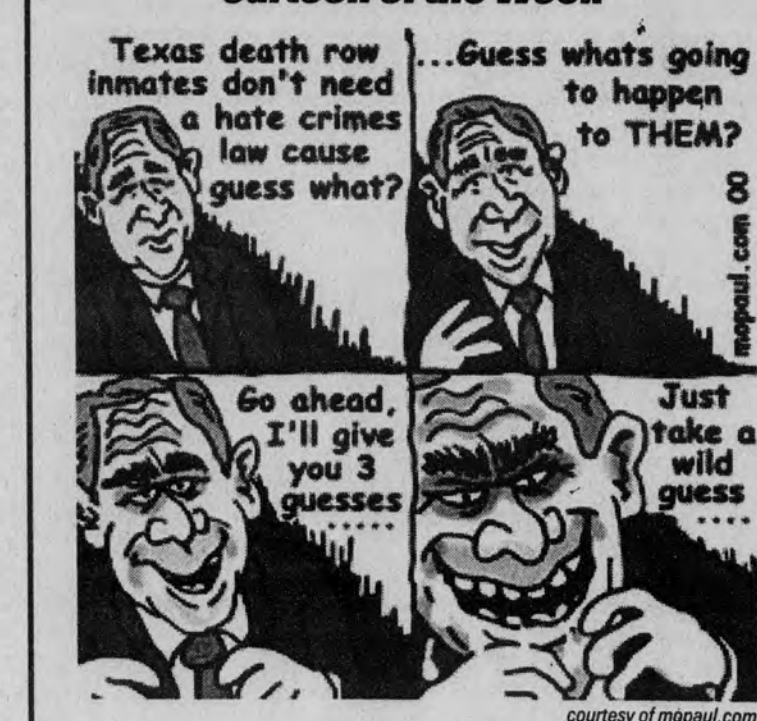

Gore also keeps stating that Texas ranks last in the nation in health care. What he doesn't take into account is that nearly all of the states in the southwest rank near the bottom of this list due to the high influx of illegal immigrants. Texas experienced a similar performance even under Bush's democratic predecessor.

The most devastating thing about all of this is that it once again raises questions about Gore's character. He has done everything he could to distance himself from the Clinton administration, yet with every white lie he strengthens his ties to the classic image of a Washington politician. Six months ago, many independents and democrats would have disregarded Gore's involvement in the scandal that eventually led to the president's impeachment. Now, the same people are asking if that is that so out of character.

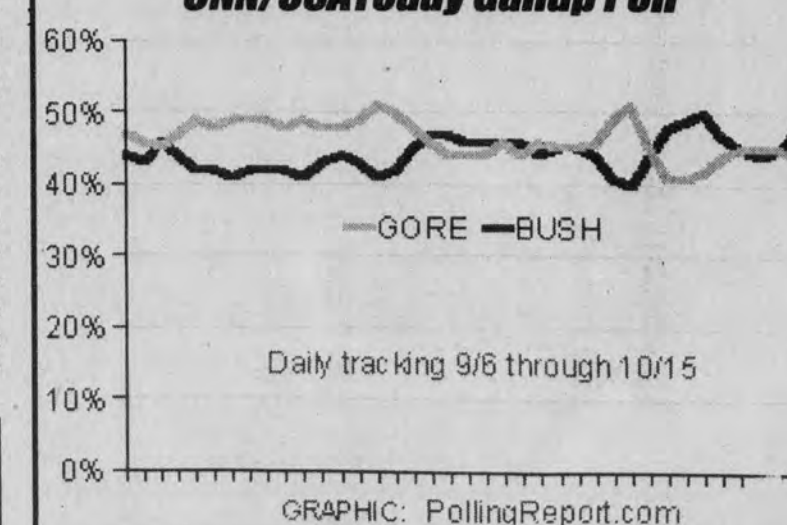

The problem for Gore is that the American people need someone as president that they can identify with. He has attempted to make himself look more human by discussing his grandchildren and his love for his wife. However, that seems to be the extent of it.

According to the Associated Press, Gore seems to have a growing obsession with his bald spot, and everywhere he goes a duffle accompanies him—the contents: a can of soda, a bottle of hair spray and a comb. Perhaps, it is this paranoia of appearing weak that makes him so distant. Most likely, it is this comb-over that will cost him the 2000 presidential election.

Many in Japan remain hesitant to take part in any nuclear arms race, as they are still feeling the effects of the 1945 bombings.

Japan questions military position

By Melissa Finklestein

How should security be defined now? This is the question as it relates to Japan, posed by Rajan Menon in the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists.

Since Russia no longer poses a threat, the foundation for the U.S.-Japanese alliance seems nonexistent. We are witness to a shift of focus that carries with it many consequences. One school of thought suggests Japan is considering a divorce from the U.S. nuclear umbrella as it develops its own nuclear force.

According to the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists, the United States has encouraged Japan to take a more active role in world defense since 1970. Some East Asian powers interpret this notion as suggestive of the American desire for Japan's maturation militarily in terms of world power.

Clearly, American leaders do not wish for a Japan that could be considered a threat to U.S. security. Rather, in an era in which the long-term viability of the U.S.-Japanese Mutual Security Treaty is tentative, Japan may develop its own military capabilities.

In reality, Japan does benefit from the alliance with the United States, as it allows Japan to spend an insignificant one percent of its GNP on security while it enjoys a non-obligation to defend U.S. interests, even in its own region.

Japan's traditional view of nuclear development since the end of World War II has been one of non-proliferation and disarmament. The popular opinion with regard to this issue has been against the evolution of the military, and is evident in a Gallup poll taken in 1998 that reported that 89 percent of Japanese people did not believe their country was in need of nuclear weapons.

Why then would Japan consider a military separation from the United States? The answer lies in the mounting threats from enemies China and Korea. Although Japanese-Korean relations are improving, suspicions remain that Korea is developing nuclear weaponry. Historically, Japan and China have had strained relations that continue to drive the Japanese desire to defend itself against this aggressive nation.

Japan has demonstrated the capabilities to advance its military forces, and only artificial boundaries obstruct the realization of a self-sufficient nuclear force. Constitutional provisions are one such obstacle. The Japan Defense Agency declares that Japan purports to be a peace-loving nation and limits Japan to developing the minimum necessary level of self-defense. Yet the Center for Defense Information assures that Japan would not need long to fully develop its nuclear capacity.

The seeming readiness of Japan to move in this direction leaves East Asia uncomfortable at best.

Milosevic steps down

By Michael Boland

It took some doing, but another Communist dictator has fallen.

Yugoslav President and notorious international bad-guy, Slobodan Milosevic, was recently defeated in a popular election, opening the door for new leadership in the politically volatile Balkan Peninsula.

Milosevic, a former party boss and holdover from Yugoslavia's Communist era, became his country's president in Nov. 1989. His tenure has been marked by authoritarian and often bloody, set against horrifying ethnic conflict between Croats, Muslims and Bosnian Serbs. As oppressive as his regime has been for the past decade, his political power has been slipping away during last year.

Yugoslavia has been in open turmoil since April, when nearly 100,000 dissident Serbians took to the streets of Belgrade and demanded that Milosevic call early elections.

Milosevic, leader of the Socialist Party, reluctantly agreed and scheduled a "national poll" for Sept. 24. Outside analysts quickly predicted that Milosevic would lose and as it turns out, they were right. Though CNN.com reports different vote counts (dependent on which faction was asked), by Sept. 25 it was clear that Milosevic's main opponent, Vojislav Kostunica, had won the election with somewhere between 50 and 55 percent of the vote. This did not stop Yugoslav's highest court, packed with Milosevic supporters, from declaring the election void. Public outrage foiled this tactic, as the court would later reverse itself and declare Kostunica the winner.

Coupled with Milosevic's Sept. 30 call to the army to do its "duty" and help restore order, the move warned European leaders as a sign that Milosevic might not be ready to give up control and would do whatever it took to maintain it.

Tension built, as Milosevic gave no indication of his plans. The opposition, led by Kostunica, appealed to international leaders to pressure Milosevic. Then to protest Milosevic's inaction, it organized a general strike that brought Yugoslavia to a virtual standstill. Milosevic remained silent.

Frustrated by his inaction, the people of Belgrade ran out of patience.

Once again they hit the streets, forcefully demanding that Milosevic acknowledge the results of the election and step down. The civil unrest even spread to Milosevic's secret police; deployed to keep the crowds in check, many of his personal soldiers spontaneously switched sides and joined the protesters.

On Oct. 5, the masses finally broke through. They stormed the federal parliament, a body complicit with most of Milosevic's abuses, and burned it to the ground. On that same day, another wave of protesters overran the state-run television station, a longtime pro-Milosevic mouthpiece, forcing it off the air. Such intense demonstrations of the desire for change are largely credited for having forced Milosevic's hand; the next day, he finally conceded the election and made way for his democratically elected successor, Kostunica.

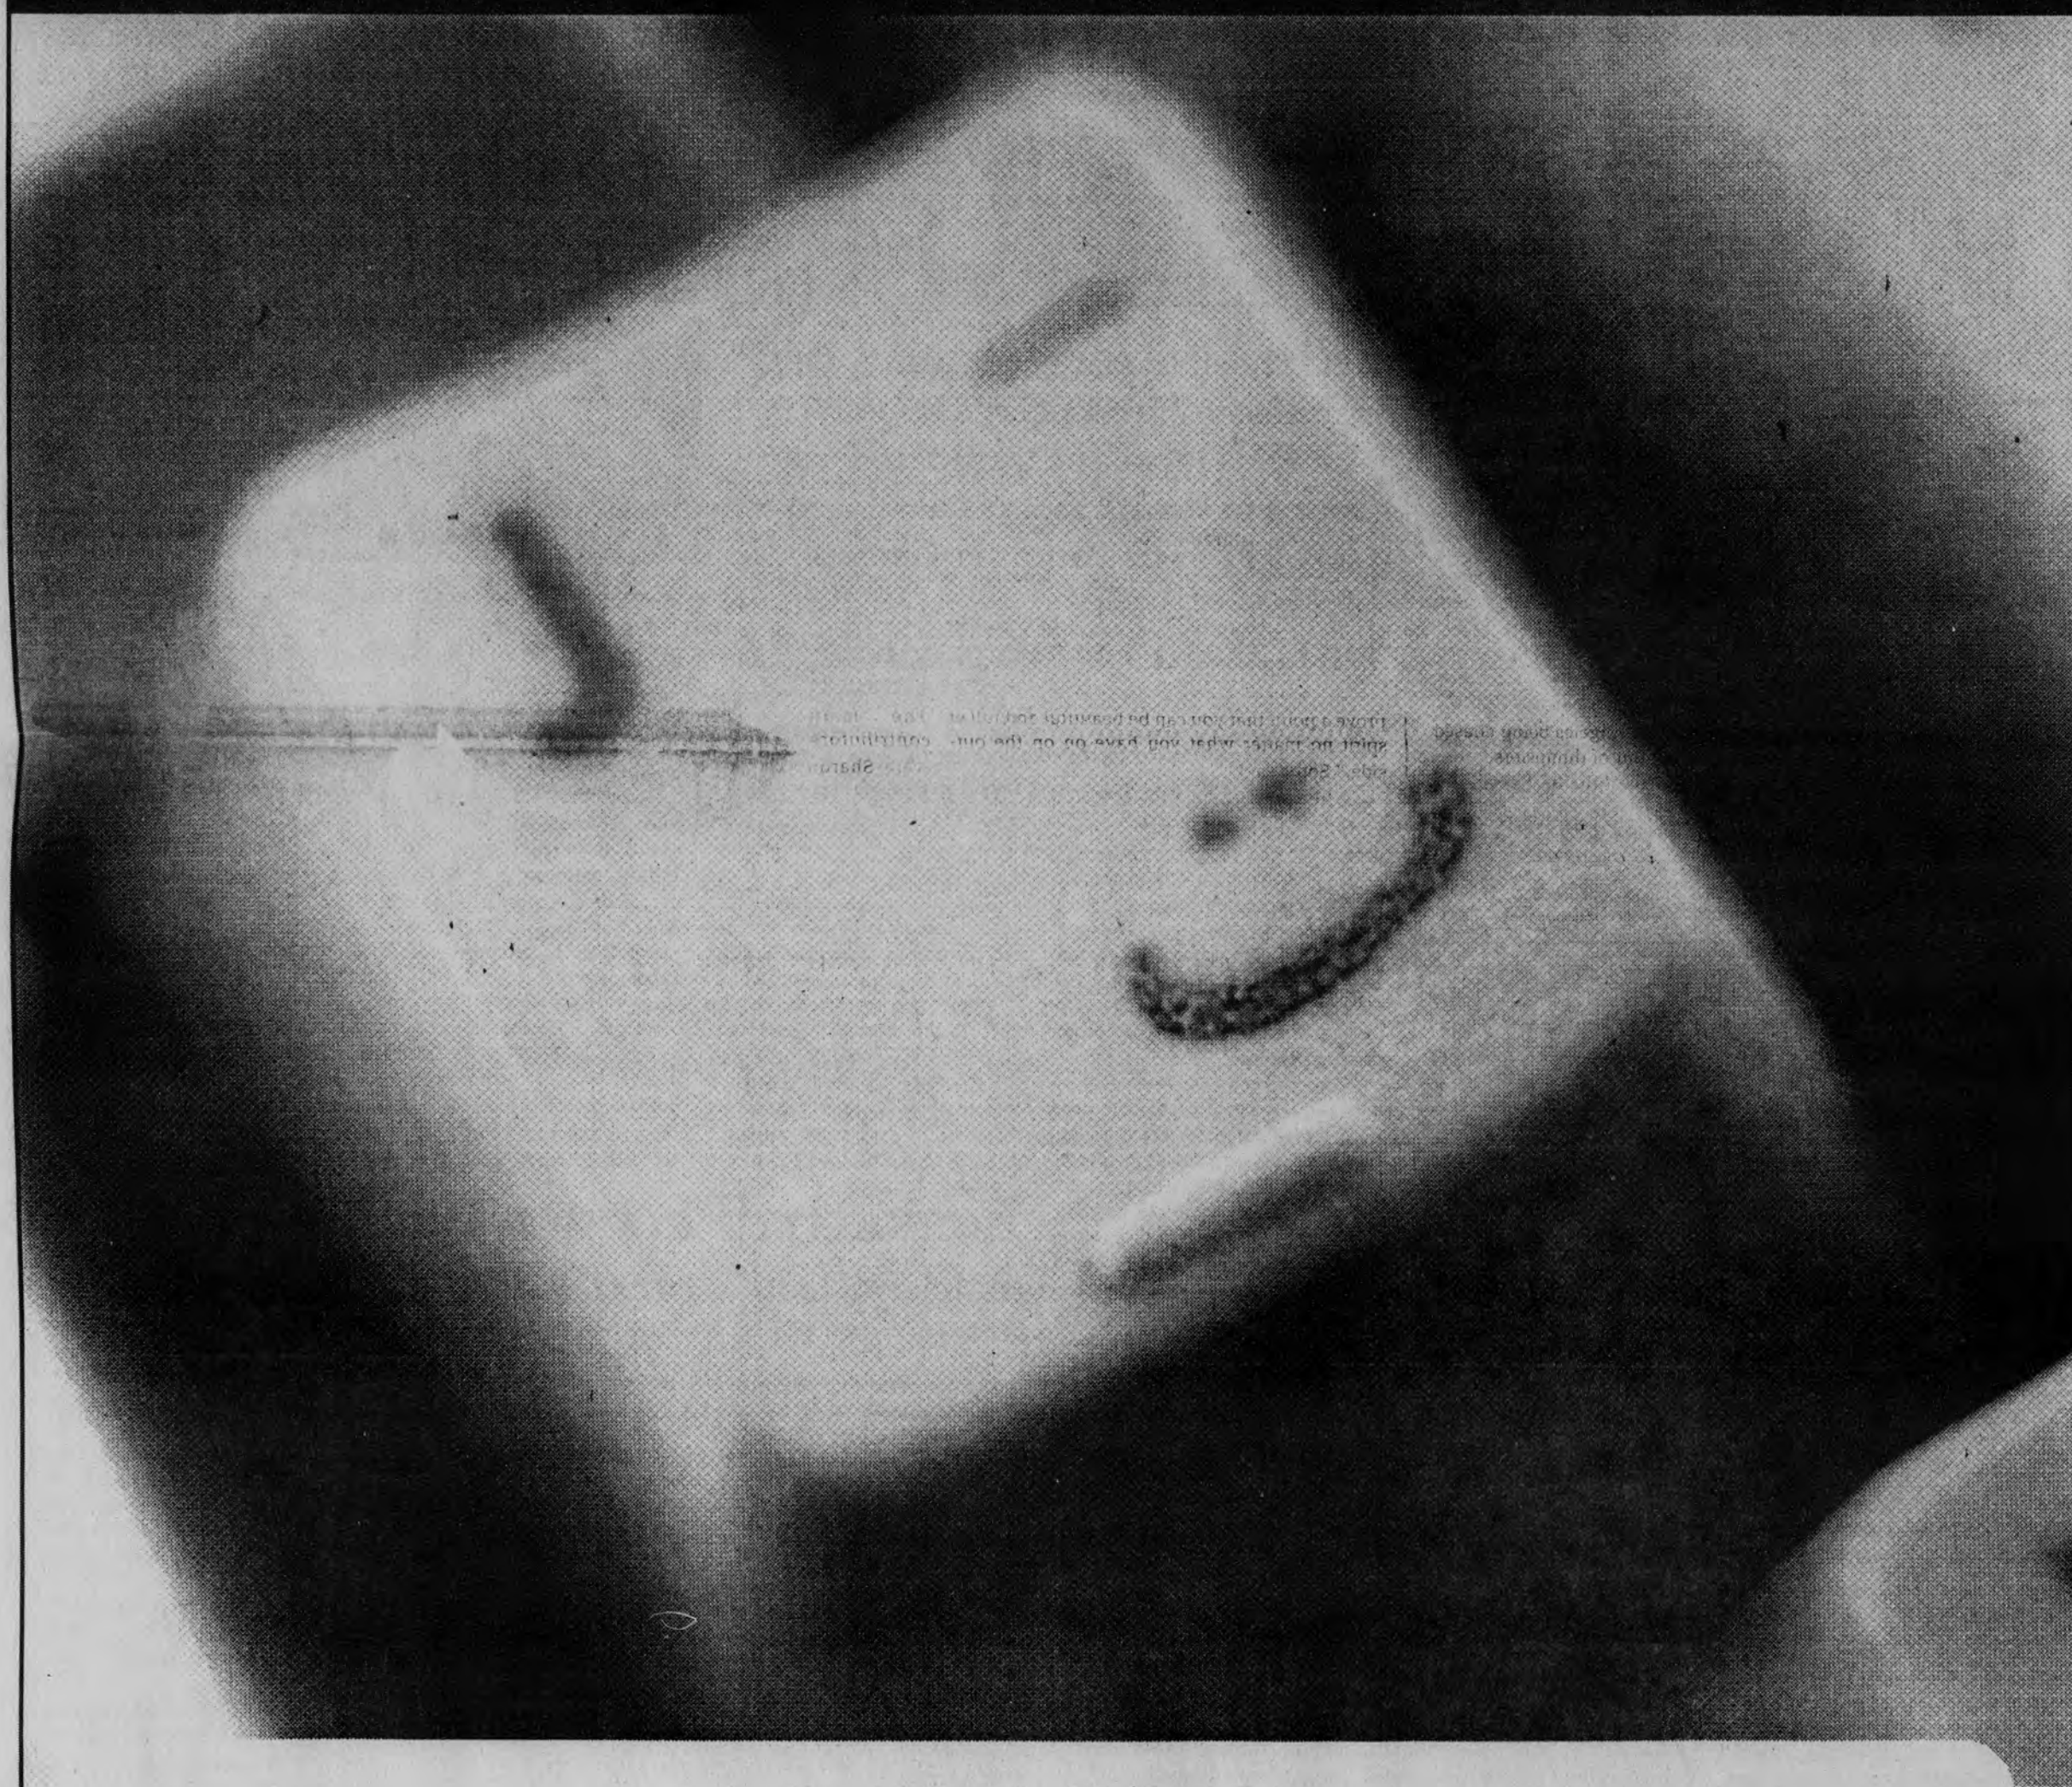

Also on Oct. 6, Russia, a fellow-Orthodox nation that often serves as a "big brother" to the Serbian people of Yugoslavia, announced its support for Kostunica, significantly enhancing his political legitimacy. China followed suit shortly thereafter, affirming Kostunica, not Milosevic, as Yugoslavia's leader.

Over the next 48 hours the final pieces fell into place. On Oct. 7 Kostunica was officially sworn in as president of his country; shortly thereafter, top military officials broke their silence and declared that Kostunica's governing coalition would have their support. The situation, while far from settled, seems to have calmed down somewhat in the past week. Kostunica is settling in, encouraged and supported by various Western powers that were eager to be rid of Milosevic. Both the European Union and the United States have lifted sanctions that had been imposed on Milosevic's Yugoslavia, and the EU even promised $175 million in aid to help Kostunica solidify his new government.

Milosevic's future is in doubt. His Socialist party still commands considerable support in the electorate, and Kostunica has shown little interest in turning him over to the United Nations for trial of his alleged war crimes. He may rise again but given the violent events of the past three weeks, it may not be for a very, very long time.

Uptown hosts SR-71

By Julie Bett

SR71 landed in Lewisburg, PA last Friday, Oct. 13, 2000, and during their brief layover, the group, piloted by lead singer and songwriter Mitch Allan, put on a supersonic performance at Uptown. The group is well known for their hit single "Right Now," which soared up the charts to #2 and was actually the last song they recorded for their first album, "Now You See Inside."

Before their performance on Friday night, I had the opportunity to speak with Dan Garvin, the drummer for SR71. Mitch Allan and Mark Beauchemin (guitar, vocals) originally started the group and recruited Jeff Reid (bass guitar) and Dan Garvin (drums) as members. At the start, they called themselves Honor Among Thieves.

They decided to change their name to SR71, after the military aircraft that set the transatlantic world speed record from New York to London, the SR71 Blackbird. Their fathers' involvement in the Airforce and the fast paced record setting image associated with the SR71 Blackbird cinched the deal and they made their first album as SR71.

I talked with Garvin about their hit song, "Right Now," and he confessed that they really did not expect it to take off. In fact, he thought to the album in one day. The songs in one day needed one complete.

SR71 promoted their album "Now You See Inside" at Uptown.

the album, however "Right Now" just was not working for them. Garvin explained that it was not until Butch Walker from the Marvelous Three reworked the song that they really got into it and then, "it was a no-brainer," all the pieces fell into place and they recorded it. Still, they were not expecting much and the song just taxied along for about a year before it really took off. Then they made a video. Garvin described the shoot as being a two-day marathon, running down the streets of Los Angeles being chased by a large German cameraman and climbing in and out of dumpsters.

The video is actually a modern day, color version of the Beatles' video, "A Hard Day's Night," however Garvin fears that many people from younger generations miss this reference to an excellent group that has given SR71 much inspiration.

Garvin said his favorite part of the video was "seeing it on MTV." That was the moment when he knew that "we got our foot in a very heavy door." The video put their faces with the song and showed everyone their sense of humor.

Keep an eye out for the band's new single to be released, coincidentally, on Election Day, titled "Politically Correct." Anyone who missed the phenomenal performance of SR71 last Friday at Uptown can get a taste of their musical flair from their album "Now You See Inside."

Poets Buck and Borkhuis to read at Bucknell Hall

By Natalie Casp

Poets Paula Closson Buck and Charles Borkhuis will read original poems from their collections this Sunday in Bucknell Hall.

New to the University this year, Buck, assistant professor of English and assistant director of the Stadler Center, is looking forward to her first poetry reading in front of the campus community.

"It's something the University asked me to do, but it's something I wanted to do too. It's a nice way to introduce myself and my work to the campus community," Buck said.

Buck will read from her book, The Acquiescent Villa, as well as some of her other poems. Most of the poems in the book are influenced by Buck's travels.

"One of the greatest inspirations for me is travel—I think that's very apparent when you hear or read the poems. Many of the images are drawn from journeys I've made. One of the central themes in a book is the tension between dailyness and the domesticity—the part that grounds you—and the soul, that part of the self that is never at home. I'm most inspired when I'm wandering, both geographically and spiritually," Buck said.

As a professor, editor of West Branch and her role at the Stadler Center, Buck finds it difficult to write as frequently as she'd like.

"I spend most of my time critiquing the reading of others—helping students achieve their own visions and aesthetics, then West Branch and then my own work, which unfortunately is, for now, not as high of a priority," Buck said, "I've worked on a novel too for the past five years and I'm finishing that up, sending it out to agents and at the same time trying to get back to poems. Summertime is the time when I travel and write most intensively."

As a guest of the University, Charles Borkhuis will join Buck in reading poems. His book, Alpha Ruins, was published by Bucknell University Press. Promotional literature about Borkhuis' book describes the poems as having textual levers and probes that turn over the ground between sometimes antagonistic factions of poetry as if they were prying up and searching through the various sites of a buried, alphabetical ruin. Borkhuis is a Professor of English at Truro College and lives in New York City.

The poetry reading, open to the public and free of charge, will take place at 8 p.m. this Sunday in Bucknell Hall.

Sopic's fashions fascinate audience fashion design company, and produce a fashion show.

"I have always had high aspirations for myself in life. I think this show made me feel secure with the direction that I am moving in. It helps me to know that what I am doing is making a difference for myself and others as well," Sopic said.

The resulting fashion show, which raised money for the Northumberland Housing Authority, was by no means an amateur production. The chemistry created by a young woman's dream and the support of an enthusiastic audience served to produce a thrilling exhibition.

"The show was more than just a runway show, it was a show that represented talent and individuality and extremely hard work. Everyone has been e-mailing me and stopping me in the street to tell me how much they enjoyed the show. It feels good to know that others enjoyed my passion," Sopic said.

Sopic's passion for fashion was conveyed throughout the positive energy produced by the combination of beauty, confidence and innovation.

"Everyone took a little piece of the spirit away with them. The Chinese characters that were on the back curtains of the runway were the Chinese characters for body and spirit, and I wanted everyone to have a positive unification feeling when they left the show," Sopic said.

While all nine creations were stunning examples of the artistic reaches possible in fashion, one costume stood out in particular. Entitled "Ruff Illumination," and modeled by Ryann Illig '01, this piece was composed of unconventional materials such as black garbage bags, yellow "caution" tape and scraps of denim. Sopic expressed a pioneering aspiration for the fashion world through this creation.

"For me, fashion is not superficial. Fashion is an art form that has more meaning than just what one sees, or more meaning than the brand label that is on it. It should be a celebration of individuality, creativity and positivity. I want to prove a point that you can be beautiful and full of spirit no matter what you have on on the outside," Sopic said.

While such materials generally convey a sense of industrial ugliness, Sopic's vision of creativity produced a majestically draping ruffled skirt out of the garbage bag, accompanied by a handkerchief-cut tube top composed of "caution" tape, and denim. This ensemble warranted a double-take as its ingenious composition denied the truth of its composition.

"The point of each piece was to represent an individual identity that has a united body and spirit," Sopic said. "Some of the clothes were made from recycled materials, and I feel that being in touch with the environment helps you be in touch with yourself, thus creating a united mind and body."

Model Khadija Shariff '03 echoed the sentiments of Sopic and applauded her hard work. "I think Natalie put together a great show. She brought out a lot of creativity, and style that was unique. People didn't expect that," Shariff said.

Lala Musayev '04, a member of the audience, praised the coordination of the individual elements of the fashion show. "The costumes and the music created a very upbeat and fun ambience. The models complimented the clothing, and the music helped to develop a truly celebratory atmosphere deserving of the obvious hard work put into the show," Musayev said.

Sopic was aided by a crew of talented people in producing her fashion show. The main contributors were Sharon Savage '01, stage manager, advisor Paula Davis-Larson, George Cowan '03, advertising director, and all nine models: Jayne-marie Angbah '02, Takeen Abbo '01, Ryann Illig '01, Khadija Shariff '03, Charity Brady '03, Janaya Harris '01, Kara Pursley '01, Maureen Dias '01 and Allison Hernandez '01.

New editors add eclectic touch to West Branch

By Natalie Casp

West Branch, the University's nationally distributed literary magazine, changed editorship last spring for the first time in nearly 25 years. With a new staff and a different look, the small and relatively unknown magazine will continue to harvest quality writing from authors around the country, but will also flirt with a more eclectic tone.

Karl Patten and Robert Love Taylor, the founding editors of West Branch, established a highly regarded publication that included solid writing from authors across the country. The transition for the new editorial staff will be an easy one. Managing Editor Andrew Ciotola said, "West Branch already has achieved a considerable reputation for a journal of its size. This is due to the perseverance and unyielding commitment of Karl and Bob. Because of them, we have a firm foundation on which to build," Ciotola said.

Joshua N. Harmon, visiting assistant professor of English and editor of the 47th edition of West Branch, began working last January on the newest issue of the magazine, following the retirement of Patten and Taylor.

Harmon includes more experimental fiction writers and poets in the upcoming issue which will be released in December.

"My tastes run towards more innovative types of literature," Harmon said.

Harmon also solicited an artist to design the magazine's cover in order to create a new look for the 21st century.

"He's somebody I commissioned because he's done good work for other hip, highly visible magazines like Wired, Atlantic and Raygun," Harmon said.

An editorial board comprised of Ciotola, Michael Carlin and Mark Svenvold worked with Harmon to ensure a smooth transition from Taylor and Patten's years of editing.

"We wanted to make our own mark on West Branch, but keep in line with what was done before," Harmon said.

Paula Closson Buck, the current editor of West Branch, hopes to increase both the amount of submissions and subscriptions that the magazine currently receives.

"The staff is working to expand distribution and to broaden the reputation already established by Karl and Bob. The magazine has a strong reputation regionally; we'd like to maintain our ties to the region but at the same time to bring West Branch to the attention of readers nationally. One way we see of doing that is to solicit submissions more broadly," Buck said.

Working on an editorial staff of a literary magazine for the first time, Buck is still grappling with the changes and direction of the 48th edition, due to be published in April 2001.

"This is my first editorship of a literary magazine, so, with the help of Andrew Ciotola and the rest of the staff, I'm still trying to figure out what West Branch will be and what changes it will undergo. We're in an exploratory mode right now."

"I'd like to see it become a bit more eclectic than it has been in the past—that's part of my vision as an editor—to offer the reader a feast of styles, including some work that is more or less traditional and some that is edgier, taking risks formally and in terms of subject matter," Buck said.

As managing editor, Ciotola anticipates enhancing the magazine's appeal within the University, as well as for outside readers.

"The current effort at West Branch is two-pronged. On the one hand, we would like to increase the magazine's presence here on campus. Several of our new programs, including the internship and the writing contest, have been arranged with this goal in mind. On the other hand, we would like to expand the magazine's visibility in the national literary community, thus making it a more estimable venue for authors to publish their work," Ciotola said.

The internship program, established this year by Ciotola and English Department Chair John Rickard, allows two selected students to work first-hand on all aspects of creating a literary magazine. This semester's interns, Brandon Dust '01 and Natalie Casp '02, contribute by reading submissions, participating in editorial meetings and decisions and creating subscription databases and advertisements.

"Working on this magazine is a wonderful opportunity for anyone interested at all in a career in publishing, particularly magazine publishing," Dust said. Literary magazines, while loosely associated with their university, serve as an indicator of the University's capability to recognize quality writing. Institutions of higher education, as well as authors, subscribers and critics, notice the artistic and literary value of small press publications.

"As a student at Gettysburg College, I experienced the way in which a first-rate literary journal can put a small school on the national literary map. Sewanee Review has had a similar effect for Chattanooga. Bucknell's reputation as an institution committed to the arts is not a small consideration in our efforts," Ciotola said.

Literary magazines can be the first step into the wider world of publication for young authors; Buck's first published poems appeared in West Branch several years ago.

"West Branch was my first publication. Three poems, I think it was, about 15 years ago. So it's funny I should end up here doing this. I've published poems in a number of literary magazines since then—The Ohio Review, Antioch Review, Denver Quarterly, Shenandoah—but West Branch was the first," Buck said.

Who needs sleep?

By Cheryl Myers

Rumor has it that Bill Clinton needs only five to six hours of sleep each night. That brings two questions to mind—First, what is he doing during those other hours of the night, and secondly, is five to six hours a night enough sleep for the rest of us?

Only the latter question is worth addressing, and the answer is no.

Adults should get at least seven hours of sleep each night, and those who do so have the lowest death rates. Teenagers require eight to ten hours. It seems obvious that Americans in general do not get enough sleep. We need look no further than the leader of our country as a prime demonstration of this lack of sleep among Americans, and college students are just as guilty of not sleeping enough.

Sleep deprivation can have many consequences, ranging from harmless falling asleep in class to the much more serious problem of falling asleep behind the wheel. Some more extreme problems are not merely caused by staying up late to study for the next day's test, but are caused by several syndromes according to Current Health 2.

Factors such as illness, drugs, stress, or depression cause insomnia, a condition in which involves difficulty falling asleep and/or staying asleep.

Delayed sleep phase syndrome (DSPS) occurs when individuals are unable fall asleep until the early hours of the morning and then have trouble waking up for work or school. Suggestions for this syndrome are to go to bed late on Saturday night and then get up on Sunday at a normal, early time.

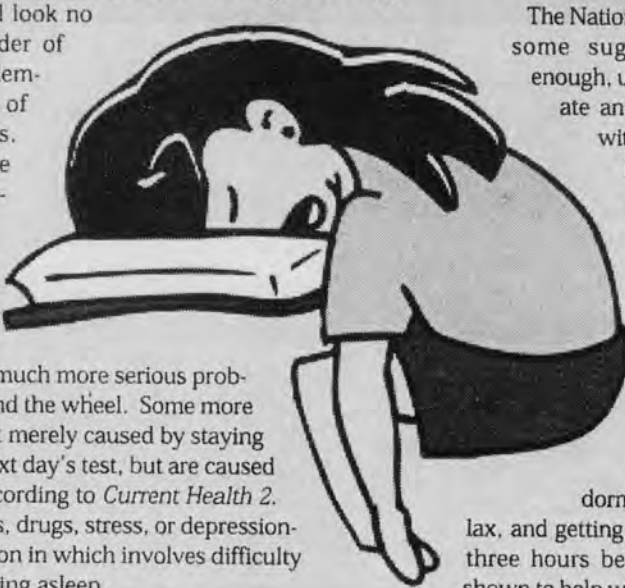

Restless leg syndrome (RLS), also known as periodic limb movement during sleep (PLMS) describes the situation where fidgety, moving legs interrupt a good night's sleep. This can be due to low levels of dopamine in the brain.

Victims of sleep apnea may stop breathing for short periods of time while they are sleeping, and is common in people who are overweight, or who have a palate that blocks the airway. Sleep apnea includes such symptoms as daytime sleepiness and loud snoring.

Other causes of sleeping difficulties that are not necessarily "syndromes" include caffeine, alcohol, and nicotine. Caffeine is not only found in beverages, but can also be in some over-the-counter medications. All of these substances disturb the sleep stages. Fragmenting a night's sleep. Exercising right before going to bed or over-exercising can also be a barrier to sleeping.

If you're still awake after reading this far, help is on the way.

The National Sleep Foundation has some suggestions for getting enough, uninterrupted sleep. Create an inviting sleeping space with cozy pillows and blankets, keep the bedroom at a comfortable temperature and remove any appliances that may hinder sleep such as televisions, computers and phones.

Mellow music, or a hot bath—a little difficult to do in the dorms—can help you to relax, and getting regular exercise at least three hours before bedtime has been shown to help with sound sleeping. Runner's World states that exercise's effect on sleep improvement could be due to fatigue, a raise in body temperature, a build-up of chemicals promoting deeper sleep or simply stress relief and mood-enhancement.

It is also important to maintain a regular sleeping schedule by waking up and going to bed at consistent times each night. Finally, keeping a journal can be beneficial to get problems off of your mind so that valuable sleep time is not spent worrying.

Sleeping medications should be avoided because they can be addictive and only induce light sleeping. If sleep problems persist, it is always beneficial to consult a physician.

Conserving endangered species through cloning

Expanding global biodiversity among researchers' motivations

By Kate Nowak

It took 277 failures until Dolly the sheep was born. However, today cloning is proposed as a novel strategy for sustaining the conservation of species such as the African wildcat, the eland, cheetah, red deer, and the gaur. Scientists advocate that, despite mortality rates, advances in cloning are under way and may provide a way to preserve and propagate species of vulnerable status. The benefits, they argue, outweigh the costs.

According to Scientific American, the birth of the world's first cloned endangered species is expected this November. An Iowa cow will be the mother of an endangered gaur bull to be named Noah. Noah belongs to a rare species of oxlike animals endemic to India, Indochina, and Southeast Asia. Only 36,000 of these animals remain in the wild due to human impact—specifically trade of horns, hides and hooves. The success of his birth will be proof that an animal can carry and bear a clone of an animal of a different species.

Cloning will also enable the introduction of new animals into the natural population in an effort to increase gene diversity. With few gaurs remaining in the wild, there is limited gene flow between populations, and thus less opportunity for the propagation of viable offspring.

Among the next candidates for cloning is the giant panda, a species that has already benefited from assisted reproductive technology. Artificial insemination of a panda pair in the San Diego Zoo resulted in baby, Hua Mei, born in August 1999. An emblem of the World Wildlife Fund (WWF), fewer than 1,000 pandas remain in the bamboo forests of southwest China.

WWF is currently conducting a population census to update the panda's current status. Meanwhile, plans to clone a giant panda are being proposed to the Chinese government. The American black bear is hoped to act as the surrogate mother.

If interspecies transfer succeeds, will attempts to clone animals that have already become extinct be made? Since 1866, the Australian Museum has preserved a small Tasmanian tiger, or Tasmanian tiger, pup in alcohol, preserving its DNA. Various strategies for DNA extraction, as well as chromosome fusion with another animal (presumably the Tasmanian Devil), are being explored.

However, both knowledge of technology and experience with ancient DNA are currently lacking.

The debate over cloning is stirring. According to Scientific American, critics claim that the method would overshadow efforts to preserve habitat—the keystone of species survival. The counter argument is that the human species is continuing to grow and habitat salvation will soon be unfeasible. Many Third World countries cannot support conservation efforts, especially the costly maintenance of endangered species in captivity or within reserves.

The role of cloning in the rescue of dwindling populations may thus be a last resort, with today's biodiversity vanishing at a rate 100 to 1,000 times greater than before the coming of humanity, reported Time magazine. While the natural lifespan of an individual species was once one million years, today it is much shorter, with extinction rates soaring.

Nature's equilibrium has been disrupted because of the slower birthrate of new species, caused primarily by environment destruction and degradation. But species do not disappear immediately—as an animal's range decreases, the diversity of its gene pool gradually lessens. Among such vanishing species are the giant panda, the mountain gorilla, the Javan and Sumatran rhinoceros, and the Chinese river dolphin.

Researchers agree that we may be in the midst of the world's seventh mass extinction. "Humanity will have to wait millions of years for natural evolution to replace what it has lost in a single century," said Edward O. Wilson, research professor at Harvard University. "Our descendants will inherit a biologically impoverished and homogenized world."

Wilson believes that the effects of species extinction will be more far-reaching than those of global warming, ozone depletion and pollution combined.

Saving biodiversity may therefore be a task for biotechnology, but since ethics plays an extensive role in assisted reproduction and surrogate motherhood, it is not known whether or not a reconciliation of interests will be met. Although the future of conservation cloning is uncertain, perhaps the birth of Noah will permit a compromise.

Homo sapiens: Are we nothing but mammals?

Researchers work to explain human relationships via behavioral studies

By Matt Albert

Scientists have previously hypothesized that humans are fundamentally mammals and consequently exhibit mammalian behaviors. Now, researchers are looking towards an unsuspecting and provocative area of human behavior: the act of courtship.

Much like our animal cousins, humans display specific characteristics and mannerisms when it comes to the mating dance. Having studied such traits for years, researchers are trying to provide some insight on both male and female courting habits. With many university date-requiring functions fast approaching, this scientific topic holds sudden relevance to the average mate-seeking student.

In all cultures, both men and women observe specialized verbal and nonverbal courtship rituals. Specific personal attributes, such as physical attractiveness or intelligence, assume more importance in mating relationships and specific facial and physical attributes account for attractiveness, suggesting that a psychological architecture may guide romantic exchanges.

This "mating strategy" has sparked interest in the scientific community. Not developed consciously, a mating strategy is defined as an integrated set of adaptations that guides an individual during courtship and determines how a person selects a mate.

Using observational data, scientists have formulated and proposed formal mating strategies. One theory put forth by Dr. David Buss from the University of Texas and Dr. David Schmitt from the University of Michigan is the Sexual Strategies Theory (SST). SST offers an explanation why men tend to favor short-term mating tactics more than do women.

Another theory has been proposed by University of California philosopher Dr. David Brin. According to his research, men and women have both very different long-term and short-term courting behaviors.

Brin separates the male approach of evaluating women into two stages. "Stage one begins and ends with physical attractiveness—manifested in terms of health, youth, and other characteristics," Dr. Brin said.

Stage two is reached when the man contemplates a greater commitment or marriage. While physical characteristics in this stage are still important, other factors, such as personality and intelligence, begin to weigh more heavily in the mate-selecting process. The choice becomes less one-sided and more of an agreement between parties. Brin adds that the existence of this second "commitment" stage in human men is a remarkable adaptation.

Since the choice is ultimately made by the female, she can immerse herself in a male population with specific characteristics, such as a certain degree of wealth or social status.

By further assessing his behavior during the courtship sequence, Magazines expand at length on dating tips, but does science agree?

Women have a very different courting strategy than males. With the job of child bearing invariably comes a more refined and sometimes direct approach to courting. Brin argues that women initially have a much greater power of choice than do men.

"When a woman perceptively approaches this man and not that man, she has the de facto made a selection. On the other hand, if the man approaches her, she also decides to accept or reject," Brin said. "If she finds him 'uninteresting' and turns away, she has selected him out. Or, if she responds positively to him, she has given him a chance to proceed. Either way, she makes the choice."

Traits desired by women in men also appear to differ greatly from those traits men desire in women. A survey of 10,000 people in 37 cultures by the University of Michigan ranked kindness, intelligence and self-confidence as the characteristics women look for most in men. Physical attractiveness and youth, though appreciated, were not among those traits considered most important to the women surveyed.

Ultimately, research of human mating behaviors suggests that courting is dominated by female choice, and all the candy and flowers that men give women to win their hearts is simply an effort to elevate the levels of some chemicals in the female brain. How romantic.

Solomon said that tech internships and making your college degree work for you was particularly helpful. "The seminar was very Internet based. They discussed that there were different skill sets used in the tech industry. There are other positions than people who just stare at a computer all day. You also need people who interface with outside clients."

Laura Denbow, director of the career development center, moderated the Careers in the New Economy Panel. Over 120 people attended this panel. This discussion focused on the skills, experiences, and qualities needed to be successful in the new technology areas. "We talked about how someone can find out about employment opportunities such as looking into trade publications, since most of these organizations do not come to campus to recruit talent."

Also talked about was the passion needed to be successful. "No one succeeds in the new economy works for the money, even though a lot of people are making a ton of it. If money is a prime motivation you will not get too far in this business. There must also be a willingness to quickly adapt to new situations and possess the love of change and the unknown," said Denbow. Like students, the speakers were equally delighted to participate in the symposium.

The speakers "were thrilled to interact with students and other alumni and talk about the important issues of emerging technology and e-commerce," said Rosevear.

Denbow said, "There was so many alumni who wanted to connect with students to talk about their experiences and to help students figure out if e-commerce is an industry they want to pursue. That genuine interest was very exciting to witness."

Men's soccer bounces back from rough Virginia trip

Sophomore Tom Ryan and the Bison will face another Top 25 team when they travel to South Carolina.

By Katie Yingling

Although Virginia may be for lovers, it is certainly not a hot spot for the Bucknell men's soccer team.

Breaking their six-game unbeaten streak, the Bison came up 0-2 against national contenders James Madison and Virginia Tech over fall break, but they got back on the winning track after dropping St. Peter's (2-1) at home this past Saturday before tying Stony Brook (0-0) on Tuesday.

"We had a lot of confidence going into our Virginia trip," goalkeeper Steve Whitaker '04 said. "I think it helped us realize that there is another level that we can reach and that we have to reach to achieve our goals for the season."

Volleyball captures first place in Patriot League with strong play

By Pat Evans

Like all great teams do, the Bucknell volleyball team has begun winning when it counts. After going a dismal 4-11 in the first part of their season, the Bison are now in first place in the Patriot League after winning six out of their last seven matches.

Bucknell's dominating defense and precise hitting have made Army, Holy Cross, Central Connecticut and Lafayette the most recent Bison victims. The Orange and Blue's only league loss thus far occurred when they outscored Lehigh, but were unable to string together their points in a 3-1 loss.

"Our defense has caused every other aspect of the game to work," head coach Cindy Opalski said. "And that's certainly indicative of the heart of this team."

The Bison traveled to West Point on Fri., Oct. 6, where they won a nailbiter over Army. Bucknell jumped out to an early lead, but the Cadets refused to quit, and the Orange and Blue needed all five sets to claim the 3-2 victory (11-15, 15-2, 15-7, 7-15, 15-11). Shannon Walker '02 led the way for the Bison with 21 kills on 36 attempts, committing only three errors in the match.

Bucknell next played at Holy Cross on Sat., Oct. 7, where all five sets were once again needed for a 3-2 Bison victory (6-15, 15-9, 13-15, 15-9, 15-9). It was a stellar defensive effort by the entire team that enabled the Orange and Blue to finish on top, led by Jen Wrigley '03 and Brandi Trapasso '04 with career-high nights with 28 and 24 digs respectively.

Bucknell's next match against Central Connecticut on Mon., Oct.

"We're really starting to play together as a team. If we can keep this up, we've got a good shot at winning the Patriot League."

—Setter Whitney Williams '02

9 proved to be not quite as difficult, as the Bison took care of business in 80 short minutes in a 3-0 sweep (15-3, 15-12, 15-8). Co-captain Brooke Bader '01 played superbly, completing 12 kills on 24 attempts and making only two errors in the match. Walker didn't break her pattern of great play, recording 13 kills on 21 attempts with a .429 hitting percentage.

"We're playing with a lot more confidence as a team," Walker said. "We're getting to a point where anyone can step in and do the job."

Although the Bison were able to outscore Lehigh on Thurs., Oct. 12, they fell to Lehigh 3-1 (16-14, 15-10, 3-15, 15-13). This game was a battle of the top two teams in the Patriot League, and with the win Lehigh moved into a tie for first place with the Bison.

Trapasso and Bader tallied 12 kills each and combined for 27 digs defensively.

The loss to Lehigh did not discourage the Bison, who regained sole possession of the top spot in the Patriot League on Sat., Oct. 14 after sweeping Lafayette 3-0 (15-7, 15-3, 15-10). Once again Walker led the way for Bucknell with eight kills on 15 attempts, finishing with a .400 hitting percentage. Setter Whitney Williams '02, who is approaching the all-time set assists record at Bucknell, recorded 26 assists in the match.

"We're really starting to play together as a team," Williams said. "If we can keep this up, we've got a good shot at winning the League."

Bucknell, now 10-12 overall and 5-1 in the conference, is pushed in practice by its competitive second unit, which Opalski calls "the best second-team in the conference." The Bison hope the competitiveness in practice will drive them in their quest to go to the highly-coveted NCAA tournament.

"Thousands of people work very hard and don't ever get there," Opalski said. "It's all about winning the Patriot League and getting to that exciting atmosphere."

Polo struggles in league

Tim Choate—The Bucknellian

Water polo showed determination but came up short against the fifteenth-ranked Princeton Tigers.

By Brooke Rea

Two weeks ago the Bucknell men's water polo team traveled to Navy for their second weekend of league play, where they went 1-3 with a win against George Washington University. Only a few days later, the team took off to Southern California for the Convergence Tournament at Claremont College, and a match-up against California Baptist. They returned Monday after going 1-4 on the weekend.

In Annapolis, the Bison faced four tough teams in Navy, Johns Hopkins, Princeton and GW. A frustrating weekend left the Bison with only one victory which came in the final game, proving that the tenacious Bucknell team refused to walk away winless.

In the first game of the weekend the Orange and Blue matched up against Navy, a team currently ranked fourteenth in national standings. The game got off to a slow start with BU falling behind 0-3 in the first quarter, but goals from freshman Jamie Saelele and senior Tate Gredtizer boosting the Bison to trail only 2-3 at the half.

But Navy came back strong in the third and tightened up their defense while also managing to outscore the Bison 5-1 in the quarter. The solitary goal that quarter, and the final one of the game for Bucknell, came from senior co-captain Kevin Permisohn. Meanwhile, Navy went on to score one more, clinching the 9-3 victory.

"Defensively we have shown that we can play with Navy," head coach John Zeigler said. "But we have yet to put together the necessary offensive production in the second half to seal the win."

The second game against Johns Hopkins was a closer battle for the Orange and Blue, but once again the team couldn't coordinate their offense and fell by only one goal, 5-4. With over 20 scoring opportunities, the Bison had plenty of chances to dominate Hopkins but couldn't finish the shots to put them in the goal.

Scorers in the game were seniors James Mante and Chris Kempton. Gredtizer and sophomore Chris Saelele, Permisohn also played well with three assists and four steals. Junior goalie Dave Kennedy had a particularly strong game, stopping 12 shots in the game and allowing only five, four of which came from four-meter penalty shots.

Game three of the weekend put BU up against an 15 ranked Princeton, a consistently tough competitor for the Orange and Blue. But the Bison came out strong, not willing to give up easily after their two losses. Scoring in the first half to Princeton's three, BU seemed to be delivering on the offensive end.

In the second half BU's offense broke down as Princeton's attack brought them to a 6-3 lead going into the fourth period. With outside shots from senior Justin McCarthy and sophomore Dan Lomendal in the fourth, the Bison tried for a comeback but Princeton answered with three goals to seal the 9-5 win.

Despite the loss, Zeigler was not discouraged with the team's play. "I was pleased with our game in that we rebounded from a frustrating prior day and held Princeton's strong offense to only nine goals," he said. "As with all of our games this weekend, our needs at the offensive end were still going unanswered."

Finally a win came BU's way when they put together a solid game against GW to win 12-8. In the first three periods a strong Bison defense held GW to only two goals, while the Orange and Blue offense generated nine goals of its own.

Junior Ryan McCarthy pumped in four goals in the contest, with Gredtizer adding three. Lomendal worked both ends of the pool with two goals and five steals, and Permisohn played strong with one goal, three assists, and two ejections drawn.

"GW was our best game of the weekend," Mante said. "It was the only game where we came out and played a full four quarters. Our offense had been struggling all weekend, but we really picked it up this game and pulled out the win."

Only four days later the men left for Claremont, CA where they would play five games before returning to campus Monday.

The first game got Bucknell right in the swing of things, when they went into sudden death overtime against UC Santa Cruz before falling 10-9. Next came a 15-10 loss to Cal Baptist, an 11-7 loss against Santa Clara University, and a 10-7 loss to UC Redlands.

BU's final match-up against host college Claremont McKenna left them with a much needed 11-7 victory. Permisohn was a key player in the contest, relentlessly defending the hole position and leading the team defense. On the offensive end he added two goals, four assists and four steals. Gredtizer netted three goals while Ryan McCarthy and Mante also added two.

Despite a tough weekend in California, Permisohn remains optimistic about prospects for the team's season finish. "In California we continued to work on our offense and try to perfect it for the upcoming championships," he said. "Overall it was a successful weekend because we showed an intensity in the final game that had been lacking earlier in the weekend."

Mante also feels confident that the team is headed in the right direction. "The difference from our first game to now is gigantic," he said, "and we are improving every weekend."

Permisohn agreed, and looks to the end of the season for the Bison to shine. "In that last game we showed that we can motivate ourselves to be competitive with the best teams out there," he said.

Athlete of the Week

Brooke Bader '01

Paige Call—The Bucknellian
Brooke Bader '01 is "killing" opponents on the court with her consistent play.

Albert Einstein is known for the famous equation E=MC². At the rate Brooke Bader '01 has been hitting the ball, volleyball gurus will rename the hitting percentage statistic ((kills-errors)/attempts) after her.

How does Bader reign over this statistic? "Brooke always makes good decisions, knows when to be aggressive, and when to but the ball in play," head coach Cindy Opalski said. "She's a true student of the game."

This past week Bader eclipsed the .400 hitting percentage twice, in wins over Lafayette (421), and Central Connecticut (417). Bader hits the volleyball where the defense is not present.

Seeing the Buckeye State native errant on that process is like seeing Omar Vizquel make an error—it is rare. "What makes her consistently high percentage so rare is that the league is gunning for her," Opalski said.

"Anybody hitting over .250 is doing a great job." In a contest in late September against Navy, Bader recorded an astounding .524 hitting average. She had 11 kills in 21 attempts and no errors. But Bader still humbly believes her hitting is not flawless.

"It is possible to be a very consistent hitter, but not a perfect hitter," she said. "My hitting will continue to improve with practice."

The Bison volleyball team has started the stretch run in their season, winning eight of their last ten contests. Their continued success leaves foes scratching their heads over Bader's equation.

Mass Immigration or Moderation?

Immigration can make — or break — a country. The key issue is numbers. The U.S. Census Bureau projects that U.S. population may double within fifty years — to more than half a billion — if the current unprecedented levels of immigration continue.

Long before then, such explosive growth will place serious strain on the environment, natural resources, and social harmony. For more information, contact the American Immigration Control Foundation on the net at www.aicf.com or call 1-800-468-2022.

Of special interest to college students: Current immigration policies may keep you from getting good high-tech jobs after you graduate. Check out the site: <http://heather.ucdavis.edu/isa.html>

Phillips maintaining a difficult balance

Senior QB has made decisions according to high academic and athletic priorities

By Brian Klotz

The scoreboard reads Bucknell 6, Visitor 10. There are twenty seconds left.

The lightbulbs that turn the numbers burn into the eyes of Bucknell senior quarterback Lucas Phillips '01 as he takes one last look before turning his head back into the huddle.

The play comes in, everyone takes their positions. As the third down play goes off, Phillips knows that he is running out of chances. As the ball leaves his hand, Jim Horan '03 comes across the middle and his arms snap around the leather.

The referee's arms go up, and so does the entire Bucknell sideline. Excessive celebration costs Bucknell 15 yards, but no one cares: the team came through in the clutch and defeated Columbia.

This play sticks in senior quarterback Lucas Phillips' mind as one of the most memorable of his career. Phillips' journey to that moment in his Bucknell career has been navigated by his rigorous devotion to both academics and athletics.

Like many talented athletes,

Phillips started his career at a particularly young age. "My mom got me into football when I was five years old," he said. "When I first started, I hated it because my older brother fore moving to running back, and finally to quarterback. When Phillips began attending high school at Mt. St. Joseph's near Baltimore, Maryland, the state experienced a passing fury that is unmatched to this day. During his four-year career Lucas set the state passing record with 6,300 yards. He also threw 52 touchdowns and set the state completion records while in high school.

When college entered the picture Lucas looked at several schools, including Maryland, but found that Bucknell best suited his overall abilities. "I chose Bucknell because of the education," stated Phillips. "I wanted somewhere where I could go to get a solid education and play football."

For Phillips, balancing football and school is a very difficult and time-consuming task. "Football is like a full-time job," he said. "I spend 30-35 hours a week in meetings, watching film, practicing and playing games on Saturday. It's really hard to balance with school. In the past I didn't play much, but now it just gets tougher and tougher."

Academically, Phillips is a double major in Political Science and French. He also serves as a teaching assistant for French. Phillips' French professor, Renee Gosson, was impressed by his ability to be a leader both in the classroom and on the playing field.

"Lucas Phillips is a model to other students faced with what, at first, appears to be competing interests," Gosson said. "He is an individual always started over me, so I didn't get much playing time."

Believe it or not, Phillips actually began his football career as a center and linebacker. He played those positions for a number of years before moving to running back, and finally to quarterback.

Bison Honor Roll

Senior quarterback Lucas Phillips was chosen as the Patriot League's Offensive Player of the Week for the week ending Sunday, October 15, 2000. Phillips had the best passing day of his career Saturday, completing a career-high 23 passes for a career-best 287 yards. He led Bucknell to its fifth straight win, a 42-30 victory over Lafayette.

Cross Country runner Becki Marshall '02 was named Patriot League Athlete of the Week for the third time this fall for the week of October 15, 2000. Marshall led the Bison to sixth place in the pre-NCAA meet at Iowa State, and finished only two minutes behind the winner in a race that included 371 runners and 20 of the Top 25 teams in the country.

Junior middle hitter Shannon Walker was named the Patriot League Offensive Player of the Week for her efforts against Patriot League opponents Colgate, Army and Holy Cross. Walker led the Bison attack against Holy Cross, hitting 23 kills on 48 attempts. Behind the hitting of Walker, the Bucknell volleyball team improved to 4-1 in the Patriot League and now has sole position of first place in the conference.

Sophomore outside hitter Jennifer Wrigley was named the Patriot League Defensive Player of the Week for her efforts against Patriot League opponents Colgate, Army and Holy Cross. In three matches during the week, Wrigley led the Bison in defensive digs in two out of the three contests. Wrigley averaged 4.07 digs per game and aided the Bison offense with 2.93 kills per game during the week.

Seniors bring Bison "winning" attitude

By Mariel DeKranis

"I am an assistant," said senior Sam Graziano, alongside his teammate Geza Lendvai-Lintner '01. Yet, as the team leaders, they have passed on more than just the soccer ball.

They have taken full control of the team, not only by providing the offense, but also by developing the players.

"It's been fun," Lintner said. "Everybody has been confident, and we play the way we want to play." Leadership, offensive prowess, dedication, friendship and confidence are the elements of victory that have been evident in the game of the Bison men's soccer team during the last couple of weeks.

Sam Graziano, a forward/midfielder, is expected to move into the Top 10 in career assists at Bucknell at the end of the season. Although he is not considered a pure goal scorer, he still emerges as a very dangerous playmaker.

Coach Brendan Nash feels that he is an All-Conference player, but he has to go out and earn it this season. Sam is an essential figure at the team's practices.

"He knows our offense and he knows what I am thinking," Nash said. "We expect the young guys to make some mistakes and it is good to have someone like Sam there to help them learn the system and eliminate mistakes."

Lendvai-Lintner, also a forward/midfielder, was named Patriot League Offensive Player for the week of September 18-25. "Geza is similar to Sam," Nash said. "He goes about his soccer in a very professional way."

"He is serious during training and demands a lot of himself and others, yet he knows when to show his lighter side. He keeps things loose in the locker room and during training when the team needs it."

"I think the leadership of all the seniors has led to more wins," freshman forward Chris Beekman said. "They all make us give 100% and then go a little further. Sam and Geza spark the team by scoring goals and developing opportunities in the game. This spark enables the rest of the team to step up to their level and play harder."

However, this was not the attitude that had outlined the team at the beginning of the season. The team had attributed its losses to an inability to generate offense. It took the huge overtime win at Holy Cross, with Lintner's play and Graziano's goal, to raise the team's heads and turn their record around.

With this confidence boost, it seemed that everyone was capable of performing to their potential. "A lot of guys needed to break out," Lintner said. "Our record is disappointing, but our play of late is what we expected during preseason," Nash said. "The way we started it would have been easy for some players to consider it a rebuilding year."

"We enter with a confidence that we didn't have in the beginning," Graziano said. "Our guys are just learning some of the things that have become second nature to the seniors," Nash said. "With Sam and Geza being patient with them it has allowed the freshman to adjust much easier."

The offense continues to improve because there are seven players on the team who now pose as scoring threats, instead of just two. "With the solid play of our new freshmen and leadership of our upperclassmen, we have not yet achieved what we are capable of," Graziano said.

Although they had known little of each other before their careers at Bucknell, Graziano and Lintner have been together on and off the field for their fourth straight year. Both played for the North Jersey Imperials in the Premier Development League this summer. Graziano and Lintner grew quite a bit playing with these older players.

Beekman admits that, as a freshman, he has learned from the experience of Graziano and Lintner. "They have played soccer much longer than I have, and they can teach me what to do and what not to do as a forward," he said. "The offense continues to improve because we are starting to play more and more like Sam and Geza. They are the key to our offense and as the rest of us continue to improve, the team will get much better."

The Bison now stand at 7-6-1 overall, and they will travel to number eight South Carolina this weekend.

Subway Series set to rock NY

By Aaron DeRosa

When Mariano Rivera closed out Game 6 against the Seattle Mariners in the ALCS this Tuesday, a collective cry rang out from New Yorkers everywhere. The long-awaited Subway Series had finally arrived after 44 years of waiting. Now the New York Mets look for their third World Series title in four appearances as they take on the defending two-time World Champion New York Yankees who look for their third consecutive ring and fourth in 5 years. Many have questioned whether or not the Bronx Bombers have enough gas left in the tank to defend their title, or whether the upstart Mets will be the second wildcard team in history to win the World Series. So do the Mets have what it takes to dethrone the Kings of New York?

As far as pitching goes, the Mets have more of an advantage over the Yanks than Shaquille O'Neall guarding an Ompaloompa in the post. This season, the Amazon's have had the luxury of an immaculate rotation, not to mention a bullpen so deep it puts the Marianas Trench to shame. Their team ERA is ranked third overall, compared to the 16th place Yanks. They have solid middle relievers, a brilliant veteran setup man, and a strong closer. The Yankees have only three Andy Pettite, the stellar lefty of the Yankee bullpen has done extremely well in the postseason thus far. He had a rough start against the Oakland A's in the pivotal Game 5 and almost cost the defending champions their spot in the ALCS, but has rebounded since then. He'll face the ever reliable Al Leiter, who looks to win his first start in his postseason career, thwarted twice by a lax bullpen that dissolved two leads in the final innings this year.

At the plate, the Yankees have struggled with consistency in the playoffs, despite batting .277 as a team (third) this season. Knoblauch is a defensive liability but has hit well so far. Jeter has run hot and cold, and it's just better not to talk about Paul O'Neill. After him, the lineup falls off into a dark vortex in time and space where no hits seem to emanate, with the exception of Williams, and Posada, the only reliable batters on the team (although Luis Sojo and Derek Jeter do well in the clutch). For the Yanks to score though, they must string together hits which will be difficult against the Mets ace pitching staff.

For the Mets, the addition of rookie Tim Lincecum in right field has revitalized a team that has lacked a leadoff batter all season. Placing the sensational Edgaro Alfonzo (working on an 11-game postseason hitting streak and a seven game RBI streak) back in the number two spot he likes so much, and moving Mike Piazza (who's on fire) to the number three spot, has taken pressure off of the future Hall of Fame catcher who is known for late season swoons. Many blame his slide on the rigors of catching, yet what it comes down to is the pressure of carrying the team by himself, a role he has not needed to fill, and thus an albatross lifted from his neck.

It will be an all New York World Series as the Yankees face the Mets.

viable starters, and without Ramiro Mendoza to shore up the middle, the bullpen is sketchy.

However, once the Yanks make it to Mariano Rivera in the ninth, who has a postseason ERA of 1.04, comebackers become virtually impossible. His Queens counterpart, Armando Benitez, has been shaky thus far, but hopes to prove that he can compete in October too. As far as the starting rotation goes, the two key battles will take place in Games 1 and 2 when Mike Hampton (3.14) takes on Roger Clemens (3.70) and Al Leiter (3.20) goes up against Andy Pettite (4.35).

Despite a ten year age difference, Hampton and Clemens are working under similar pressures. Hampton, the Cy Young runner-up last year (22-4, 2.94), hopes to live up to the Mets expectations. He is coming off of 16 shutout innings against the hitter-dominated Cardinals. Similarly, Roger Clemens, a five-time Cy Young winner who has struggled in his two seasons in NY, hopes to recapture his former glory. He is coming off the best start of his 16 year career, a one hit shutout to the Mariners, a feat eclipsed only by the fact that Bobby J. Jones, the Mets fourth man, did it only six days earlier to the San Francisco Giants. But most importantly, both Hampton and Clemens wish to prove themselves worthy to play in New York, making this a veritable battle for the "Ace of New York."

NHL season starts with bang

By Kevin Logan

Talk about the Big Bang Theory. The 1999-00 season ended with a bang—Jason Arnott's double-overtime goal in Game 6 to give the Devils their second Stanley Cup—and the 2000-01 NHL season kicked off with one.

Teams took to the ice just two weeks ago, and already the action has been incredible. Aside from the debuts of yet two more expansion teams, bringing the league to a current total of 30 franchises, several notable records have been approached or broken.

The first to notch a milestone was none other than Brett Hull. The Dallas Stars star right winger scored two goals in Friday's game against the Philadelphia Flyers. But they weren't just any two goals. They were the 613th and 614th of his career.

That's a lot of goals, you say? That's putting it lightly. That second goal vaulted him over top of Pittsburgh legend Mario Lemieux's eighth-place spot on the all-time place list for career goals. And Hull still has more goals and seasons to come.

Not a bad start to the year, eh? Well, there was more.

This time, Patrick Roy would be the man of the hour. After defeating the Canucks this past Thursday, the Avs' star netminder needed just one more victory to pull alongside the legendary Terry Sawchuk for most career NHL wins all-time (448). And win one more he did.

On Saturday, Roy and his Avalanche held the expansion Columbus Blue Jackets to just one goal, paving the way for a 3-1 victory. With that, Roy only needs another victory (his next chance is Tuesday, October 17th) and he can claim the title of winningest goaltender in the history of the National Hockey League. And what's even more stunning is that it's only taken him a total of 846 games to reach Sawchuk's record; it took Sawchuk 868.

And finally, a less stunning record, but an impressive one nonetheless: The same night that Patrick Roy came one step closer to rewriting the record books, San Jose Sharks center Vincent Damphousse notched a big assist on a short-handed Marco Sturm goal against the Bruins. "Big" because it was his career 1,000th point, making him just the 58th player to score that many. Damphousse now has 368 goals and 632 assists to his name.

Aside from all the milestones, there are two new teams that have joined the ranks of the NHL this year—the Columbus Blue Jackets (the same ones who provided Roy with his Sawchuk-tying victory) and the Minnesota

Patrick Roy looks to become winningest keeper. Wild. The BJ's, playing in the Central Division of the Western Conference, recorded their first win as a franchise this past Thursday against the Flames, thanks to a pair of goals from Kevin Adams, including the game-winner.

The Wild, also playing in the Western Conference, but as a member of the Northwest Division, are likely to be a big attraction in Minnesota, since they're bringing NHL hockey back to the state after the departure of the North Stars to Dallas in 1993.

The Wild played their first NHL game last Wednesday against Philadelphia, and held a 3-2 lead going into the third period, until Eric Desjardins scored to knot the score at three and force an uneasy overtime.

So with all this action and excitement already surrounding the league, amidst the flurry of baseball playoffs and NFL games, the NHL looks to have picked up right where it left off last season. And if that continues to be the case, we're in for a real treat.

NFL Experts' Picks

By Justin McCarthy and Ali Ahmed

Detroit at Tampa Bay

This game will be a matchup of two teams very different from those who met earlier this season in a 31-10 Tampa Bay victory. Detroit has finally found part of its offense, but its rushing game is still performing sporadically. The acquisition of James Stewart was supposed to re-ignite the rushing game in Motown, but so far its comeback has been off-tune. The Lions' roar will lie in the arm of QB Batch. In order to defeat the Bucs, the Lions will need Stewart to find running room, for they cannot allow such a talented defense like Tampa Bay's the luxury of focusing its attack on one offensive aspect. The Bucs, on the other hand, look nothing like the team that scored 93 points in its first three games. Tampa is on a three-game losing streak, and it needs to find the offensive niche it occupied earlier. Also, the defense has had too many lapses at key moments resulting in giving up big plays. The Bucs' offense will need to provide solid support in backing up its talented defense.

Justin's pick: Bucs 20-16

So far this season, Detroit's defense has been carrying it and the offense, led by Charlie Batch, is starting to come around. The Lions have always had good receivers and added big free agent James Stewart this off-season. The big key has been Batch's recovery and improvement. A large part of that is more time in the pocket after a slightly-shuffled offensive line started playing better. However, the offensive line will face a big test this week when it goes against an impressive front seven, including last year's Defensive Player of the Year, Warren Sapp. With the defensive line of Tampa able to put pressure on the quarterback by themselves, the receivers will be facing double-coverage all day unless Detroit can get a run game going. However, to run against a defense led by Lynch and Brooks might be impossible. Still, Tampa will need to score to win and everybody is waiting for Tampa's offense to break out.

Ali's pick: Bucs 17-9

St. Louis at Kansas City

Does anyone have a chance at beating these Rams? When a team's defense lets up an average of 29 points a game, they should at best hope to be at .500. However, when you're the Rams and your offense's season-low is 37 points, you are a 6-0 club. The Rams' offensive formula is simple: burn everyone with superior speed at almost every offensive position. Defenses are unable to keep up with them for an entire game. Their offense is averaging an astounding 519 yards per game. Kansas City, if they hope to have any chance, will need to score points early and place pressure on Warner almost every down. The Chiefs' corners will need to have huge games; part of which entails keeping an eye on Faulk out of the backfield, who is the Rams' leading receiver.

Justin's pick: Rams 38-27

I think that the Rams are in a position to get upset. There is no way they can keep this streak going. Last week they had another huge game and set a few more records, but Arrowhead Stadium will be where they'll lose their first game of the season. The Rams obviously have one of the worst defenses in the league—anybody can run on them. Now they come up against a team that is throwing the ball very well and should continue to do so against the Rams. The Rams' offense is too good to be true, and the Chiefs are a very disciplined defensive team, which should make Martz's shifting of formations less effective. I think that the Rams are bound to have a bad offensive day once in a while. Warner may have an off day or Hakim will revert to his habit of dropping balls. Somehow, the Rams' offense will not be able to rescue the questionable defense this time.

Ali's pick: Chiefs 33-31

Cleveland at Pittsburgh

The Steelers are a different team than the one that lost by a field goal to the Browns in Week 3. They have recovered from an anxious 0-3 start to win their last three games very convincingly, while their defense has given up only one touchdown during that streak. Their receivers have vastly improved, although the QB spot still has its weaknesses no matter who the starter is. But most importantly, they have the Black & Gold, it's having a healthy Benett leading the number one rushing game in the conference (136.7). The Steelers' defense is among the elite in the league, not allowing a starting QB to throw for 100 yards in the past two games and holding the starting RB's for the last three weeks to 2.6 yards a carry. The Browns have struggled since their win over the Steelers, having lost 4 consecutive games. The Browns' fortunes lie in the arm of Couch and his receivers' hands; although the way the Steel Curtain has played of late, it looks as if the "Dawg Pound" will be shut down.

Justin's pick: Steelers 24-10

Earlier this season when I left picking the Steelers to win, everyone (rightfully) thought that I was biased, but now I hope they see the light. It looks like the Steelers are starting to put their game together, and they need only their special teams' coverage and passing game to improve. Their run defense, led by Kirkland, is just amazing—holding Eddie George, Fred Taylor, Curtis Martin and Corey Dillon to less than three yards a carry. And their pass defense has gotten better. The running game has also been incredible, led by the play of center Dawson. There is no way Cleveland will be able to run the ball. With Gildon and Porter playing the pass-rushing linebacker spots so well, Couch will have a tough day. I really think that Kordell should be the starter for the Steelers, but they'll go with Graham. If he doesn't come through in this game, I think Cowher has to make a change. Also, if WR Plaxico Burress does not improve, Cowher should move Edwards or Shaw into the starting lineup. Whatever quarterback plays, he'll need consistency in his starting whereabouts to energize the passing game. But that won't matter in this rout.

Ali's pick: Steelers 36-6

Miami at NY Jets

This matchup of AFC East divisional co-leaders may have strong playoff implications if both teams continue to dominate their current levels. Both teams are strikingly familiar in their styles of play: each rely on strong rushing attacks to take pressure off of their passing games, Miami more so than NY. The Jets can at least turn to a veteran leader in Testaverde if their rushing game is shut down; however, the Dolphins will be in trouble if the Jets' defense accomplishes that feat, for Fiedler is averaging only 23 pass attempts a game and is not nearly ready to take the reins. Miami will need to ride its defense, which is allowing an NFL low 8.5 points per game, while giving up only three TD's all season. However, Miami has not beat a team this season with as good an offense as the Jets. Both teams' records may seem inflated, for the Jets have not played a team that is currently over .500 and the Dolphins have only beaten one team currently better than .500. In the end, the Jets will down the Dolphins.

Justin's pick: Jets 20-10

I really thought that Miami was going to stink this year, but if you don't let the other team score, I guess a team can still win—even with Fiedler at quarterback. It is really incredible how many dominant defenses there are in the league, but Miami might be the best among them all, led by corner Sam Madison. It might seem impossible for the Jets to score on Miami. Madison should take out Chubb, and Miami hasn't allowed any team to run on them. However, the Jets' coaching staff has found ways to score occasionally and they really won't have to score much to win. The Dolphins won't go very far if they make the playoffs because their offense is absolutely terrible. They have no stars and no one who can make plays. In the end, it just might come down to special teams deciding which team is going to be on top in this one.

Ali's pick: Jets 9-3

Tennessee at Baltimore

The Ravens have not scored a touchdown in three consecutive games; however, their defense is arguably the best overall in the league, recording three shutouts already this season. However, their 5-2 record is very misleading. Their five wins have all come against teams that are .500 or worse, and they've lost to every team they've played that was over .500. The Ravens' defense is top in the NFL in allowing only an average of 57.9 yards rushing a game and they have not allowed a 100-yard rusher in 24 consecutive games, although Eddie George will be the best back the Ravens have faced this year. He is looking for his fourth consecutive 100-yard rushing game. The Ravens' offense lives and dies with QB Tony Banks, and if the Titans' secondary is able to force the run then the Ravens' hopes of putting points on the board are all but shattered. Its bad news for the Ravens that the Titans lead the AFC in pass defense, allowing just 158.2 yards a game. The Titans lost their opener but have gone undefeated since. If the Rams are the team to beat in the NFC, then the Titans are vying for that title in the AFC.

Justin's pick: Titans 23-9

Buffalo at Minnesota

This week might be a week of upsets. I really think that Buffalo has a good chance at beating the Vikings. The Vikings' defense is questionable and will have even less of a pass rush with Paup out, while the Bills' offense should be energized by Flutie taking over for the injured Johnson. Plus Moulds and Price should have a good day against the Viking secondary. On the other side of the ball, the Bills' defense should be able to stop Robert Smith easily—meaning that second-year man Culppepper is going to have to win the game by throwing the football. However, when you are throwing to Moss and Carter, it makes things a lot easier. No one in the Bills secondary can stay with Carter let alone Moss. I really felt tempted to pick the Bills, but I think that the Vikings will hold out as the only unbeaten after this week.

Ali's pick: Vikings 27-26

Cross country runs into trouble at Pre-NCAA Meet

By Rose Sedo

While the rest of campus was enjoying their Fall Break, the Bucknell University men's and women's cross country teams raced at the prestigious Pre-NCAA Meet in Ames, Iowa last Saturday.

The meet included 20 of the Top 25 teams from both the men's and women's sides, and was run on the same course that the NCAA Championships will be run on later this fall. The Bucknell women finished 29th as a team, led by junior co-captain Becki Marshall, who crossed the line in 69th place with a time of 22:21.0.

Sophomores Theresa Dennis and Andrea Beisser finished 97th (22:33.4) and 108th (22:38.6), respectively. Junior Chris Crowe was 238th in 24:00.5. But as far as the women were concerned, the results were positive.

"The ladies raced pretty well with the field. There were about 400 athletes running at once, and it was a tough situation to be in. Some of us reacted better than others," Guldén said.

Results on the men's side were a little more disappointing, but Guldén believes that the race is not an indication of what will happen at conferences.

"We just got overwhelmed by the size and the magnitude of the race, but we expect to bounce back. Everyone has a bad race, but the true teams rise above it," Guldén said.

The men finished 52nd out of 53 teams. Sophomore Greg Costello was Bucknell's top finisher, crossing the line in 217th place with a time of 33:17.7 on the 10,000-meter course. Bryan Johnston '03 and senior Josh Emery '01 finished 294th and 295th, respectively, with times of 34:18.7 and 34:19.10.

Several Bucknell men ran in the "B Race," led by Travis Eiters '02 and P.J. Ward '02, who finished 44th and 45th with times of

"We just got overwhelmed by the size and the magnitude of the race, but we expect to bounce back. Everyone has a bad race, but the true teams rise above it." —head coach Art Guldén 33:56.3 and 33:59.4, respectively.

The Bucknell University men's and women's cross country "B Teams" also competed at the Delaware Invitational at White Clay Creek State Park last weekend. Both the men's and the women's teams finished in second place behind the host Blue Hens of Delaware.

Jim Stack '01 finished in third place to lead the Bison in the men's race with a time of 26:49. Eric Furst '03, Marcus Jones '04 and Dan Hosey '01 finished seventh (27:20), eighth (27:26) and tenth (27:30), respectively, as Bucknell placed four runners among the Top-10.

Freshman Jessica Brooks paced the women's squad with a sixth-place showing in 24:46. Classmate Holly Potts '04 was seventh in 24:49, followed by Michelle Baylor in eighth (24:59) and Stephanie Keller in ninth (25:11). The Bucknell men's and women's cross country teams will be competing again on Saturday, October 28, when they travel to Lehigh to defend their Patriot League crowns at the league championship meet.

Golf preps for ECACs

By Caitly Selleck

The Bucknell women's golf team traveled to Lehigh University last weekend to participate in the Patriot League Championship, where Bucknell's five participants composed the top five finishers.

This week, the team will prepare for its open tournament, the ECAC Championship, which will take place on Monday and Tuesday of next week, Oct. 23-24.

The Bison traveled to Bethlehem, Penn. for the Patriot League Championships on Sunday, but the best competition they found was each other. Placing first in the tournament was junior Hilary Mainka with a score of 80. Molly Campbell '03 also shot an 80, but took second place after a tie-breaker.

A trio of sophomores rounded out the top five for the Bison. Amy Jones took third with a score of 88, Jess Hettich took fourth with an 89 and Catherine Crews finished fifth with 92.

"I think that we managed the course very well," Crews said. "Our short game has shown a major improvement as our chipping and putting continues to get better, and that combined with our increasing confidence is improving our game as a whole."

As Bucknell has the only official women's golf team in the Patriot League, there was no team scoring, as the other schools represented—Colgate, Lafayette and Lehigh—only had a few competitors.

"I think that as a whole the team is looking much more confident and comfortable which is exactly what we will need in ECACs next week," head coach Kevin Jamieson said. "The whole week that we have before ECACs will be very helpful as we fine-tune some things and get our heads together."

The ECAC Championships, which will be held at UMBC in Frederick, Maryland, on Oct. 23-24, will be a two-day tournament where Bucknell will face many of the same tough competitors that it has seen already this season, including Princeton, Dartmouth and Yale.

The Bison are optimistic about their chances. "At this point in the season everyone seems to be taking it much more seriously, and our longer practices have helped with that," Mainka said. "We seem to be peaking right now, and it couldn't be at a better time with ECACs coming up."

BISON DROP LAFAYETTE 42-30

with a 30-yard touchdown pass to Jim Horan '03.

Overall, Phillips went 23 for 32 for a total of 287 yards and two touchdown passes. This performance was good enough to earn him Patriot League Offensive Player of the Week honors. Phillips was able to pick apart the Lafayette defense, and he attributed much of his success to his offensive line.

"When you have all day to throw the ball, it's almost easy," Phillips said.

Ten different receivers caught the ball for the Bison on Saturday. "We get as many guys to touch the ball as possible," Phillips said.

Things looked bleak for the Bison later on in the first quarter, when Phillips threw his first interception of the day and Lafayette capitalized on the turnover. Phil Yaberough made a spectacular leaping catch in the end zone to put the Leopards up 14-6, but the Bison would dominate the next two quarters of the game.

Powell returned to the game after taking a few possessions off, and contributed right away with his first touchdown run of the day from nine yards out. The Bison attempted a two-point conversion, but it failed and the score remained 14-12 in favor of Lafayette. It looked as though the Bison were going to drive in for another easy score when they fumbled the ball inside the Lafayette five-yard line.

"Turnovers come in bunches," Gadd said. "Hopefully we got them all out of our system."

The Bison defense made up for the offensive mistake and held the Leopards to a three-and-out, which gave Bucknell great field position to work with on its next possession. Phillips converted with a seven-yard touchdown pass to LaMarr Bradwell '01.

Lundberg converted the extra point to give the Bison a 19-14 lead at the end of the half. Their lead at the half gave the Bison the confidence to enter the second half of the game strong. "It relaxed us a little bit," Gadd said.

On Bucknell's first drive of the second half, Lundberg kicked a 46-yard field goal that barely cleared the cross bar. He later added 39 and 22 yard field goals.

"The field goals, I thought, were big plays," Gadd said. "Lundberg has come a long way since the beginning of the season, and is now a very reliable kicker. I have a lot of confidence in him."

The Bison defense set up most of the offense in the third quarter. After Lundberg knocked in his first field goal, the Bison forced a fumble, and recovered it on the Lafayette 22-yard line. On the next play from scrimmage Powell ran the ball in from 22 yards out for the score. This gave the Bison a 29-14 lead early in the third quarter.

The Bison defense was very strong for the remainder of the quarter. With an injury to Tom Kuhn '01, the Bison needed someone to step up on the defensive line. That person was Juan Morales '03, who made numerous tackles in the backfield.

Late in the third quarter, Evans picked off a Lafayette pass, and returned it 82 yards for the touchdown. This was the longest interception return in the history of Bucknell football. On his long journey down the field Evans nearly tripped twice, but he said that he eluded tacklers by, "just turning on the burners."

In the fourth quarter the Leopards added two more scores, and Lundberg knocked in his third field goal of the day to make the final score 42-30.

The Orange and Blue now face what could be their toughest opponent of the season this Saturday at Lehigh. The Mountain Hawks are currently undefeated with a 6-0 record. They are also ranked 13th in country in NCAA Division I-AA. The game is at Lehigh, and the Bison will be looking to extend their winning streak and keep on pace with the leaders of the Patriot League.

And the survey says...

By Scott Kloss

The results are back and it's a tie! That's right, you and your fellow Bucknellians think this will be a close World Series!

The Subway Series is now full and this time it isn't for the millennium party! The N.Y. Mets and N.Y. Yankees are set to due battle with World Series honors as the prize. The long-awaited Subway series is finally more than reporters' wishful thinking. The Yankees, going for a Chicago Bulls type three-peat, face the youthful vigor of the New York Mets.

Steammrolling through the playoffs, the Mets seem to have the momentum going into the series with stellar pitching performances from Bobby Jones and Mike Hampton, while Tim Lincecum and Alfonso have lead them with their bats.

The Yanks are also on a streak, but they haven't dominated as in years past. Still, coming off a one-hitter, Roger Clemens looks more confident than ever, but is that enough? Will the Shea Stadium crowd rattle The Rocket or will the ghost of Mike Piazza (whom Clemens beamed in the head with a fastball) come back to haunt him? Meanwhile, Bernie Williams and Paul O'Neill are finding their stroke in time. This series has all the makings of a country western movie set in city!

Scott's prediction: Mets in six.

Quotes:

"The Mets are playing better baseball right now than anyone. They've won seven of nine games in the playoffs, showing that they can outpitch anyone, especially in the late innings. Pitching wins championships, and no one has a better staff than the Mets"—Matt Dino '04

"If the Mets/Yankees series does take place, the Mets should win to squash any three-peat ideas in the Bronx. Let Queens celebrate for once"—Louis Blau '03

"The Mets are without a doubt the best team in MLB. They will crush all opposition in route to becoming World Series Champions. Break out the broomsticks because the Yankees are about to get swept!"—Evan Jenkins '01

"The Yankees pitching staff is deeper than the Mets. Also, the bullpen on the Yankees is better than the Mets with Rivera, Nelson and company. The Yankees order is deeper than the Mets, yet the Mets have Piazza. I think the Yankees will win in six games"—Andrew Tichenor '04

Next week's question:

Who is the best all-around player in New York?

1. Edgardo Alfonzo
2. Derek Jeter
3. Mike Piazza

Sports

Booted booter

With the recent success of the women's soccer team, the WNBA and the various U.S. women's Olympic teams, women's sports seem to be at an all-time high. But while the media may be caught up in the sports equality movement, some facts are still being overlooked. Still to this day, women's collegiate sports programs do not receive as much financial support as men's, and for sports where there are no separate teams for the opposite sexes, females are still being discriminated against.

A simple reminder of this fact occurred last week when a former female student at Duke University won $2 million in punitive damages after it was decided that the Duke football program was guilty of sexual discrimination. Heather Mercer entered Duke as a freshman in 1994 and tried out for the football team as a walk-on kicker. At Yorktown Heights High School in New York, Mercer was a four-team all-state kicker as a senior, converting 28 of 31 extra points and a third of seven field goals her senior year. But she didn't make the Duke squad but served as a team manager.

The following spring she participated in conditioning drills and was invited to play in the annual Blue-White Intra-squad scrimmage. All she did was kick the game-winning, 28-yard field goal for the Blue team. Duke head coach Fred Goldsmith was so happy that he immediately told Mercer that she was on the team. Assistant Coach Fred Chatham told Goldsmith afterwards, "Coach, she's not very good," but Goldsmith would have none of it. "Oh, no. She'll work hard. She'll come around," he said.

The following season, she attended practice regularly, but was not allowed to suite up for any games. Before the start of the 1996 season, she was told that she was no longer on the team. In the spring of 1997, she was not allowed to participate in conditioning drills, which are basically open to anyone. Mercer believed that she was kicked off the team for no reason other than her sex. So she sued.

But as is the case with mostly every trial, there are two sides to the story. It just depends on how you look at it and whom you believe.

If you believe what Coach Chatham says is true then Goldsmith was willing to give Mercer a shot, even though his assistant told him that she wasn't that good. Goldsmith saw potential in Mercer because she reminded him of his two daughters. Goldsmith went out of his way to give an under qualified kicker a shot at the team.

As for the game-winning kick that Mercer hit in the scrimmage—it is said to have been a wobbly floater. A 28 yard field goal is virtually automatic at the collegiate level, and to barely make it over the crossbar has to make you wonder. I think Coach Goldsmith simply got caught up in the moment.

In addition, Mercer's career long in high school was a mere 33 yards. Granted most kickers at the high school level aren't going to hit from 40 yards away consistently, but kickers in college are expected to make them. Mercer's former high school coach Ron Santavica told, "I'd say her accuracy was 35 to 40 yards ... But the key to Heather's success was her accuracy."

Also, former Duke standout Tjion Redmond had this to say after seeing Mercer kick in 1995, "Of the three (kickers) we had, she was the most accurate. In my mind, she was definitely the best kicker we had that spring." Once again, no sign of how good her leg strength was. Looking even closer, Redmond also admitted that two of the best place kickers did not participate in the spring practices for one reason or another. He is quoted as saying that Tom Cochran, who was out due to a groin pull, was their best kicker.

It sounds as if the Duke lawyers may have been correct in their statement that Mercer was cut due to a lack of leg strength. A lot is made regarding her accuracy, but it doesn't matter how accurate you are if you can't kick from long distances. And getting cut from a football team because you have sub-par leg strength doesn't show any signs of wrongdoings. But of course, there's more to the situation than just leg strength.

After Mercer was told she made the team in 1995, she was not permitted to sit with the team on the field during games, whereas other walk-on kickers were. She believed that she was not getting as fair of a shot as the others. But team policy is to let the walk-on place kickers move to other positions if they don't make the team. They're put on the scout team and are virtually used as tackling dummies.

Because of size (5'9", 145 lbs), Coach Goldsmith didn't want to use her as a tackling dummy, which would make her susceptible to possible injury, so he didn't allow her to change positions. In what may have been an innocent gesture, Goldsmith may have in fact violated her rights.

This is definitely a complicated situation that may not have a right answer. On one hand, she should have been given the opportunity to switch positions if she wanted. But the reality is that she could have gotten severely injured solely because of her size. Football is a violent sport that can affect you for the rest of your life. So shouldn't the coach have the right to stop someone from getting hurt? But in today's society where good deeds can often go unnoticed, this one turned out to be grounds for punishment.

There is sufficient evidence coming from both sides regarding the question of discrimination, but we will never know what really happened. Was Heather Mercer indeed discriminated against because of her sex? The courts ruled in favor of Mercer, but that doesn't mean that you must agree with the decision. But one thing you are forced to agree on is the fact that this trial will have a big impact on the future of collegiate and interscholastic sports in the U.S.

Bison push winning streak to five

By Cory Nadler

After losing his season opener to a nationally ranked Richmond team, the Bucknell football team has won five straight games, including a 24-10 triumph over Georgetown on Oct. 7 and a 42-30 win over Lafayette on Oct. 14, putting the Bison in a formidable position moving into their Patriot League schedule.

"This is a very balanced league," coach Tom Gadd said about Bucknell's prospects for the remainder of the season. "We could lose the next five games, but we are taking them one at a time."

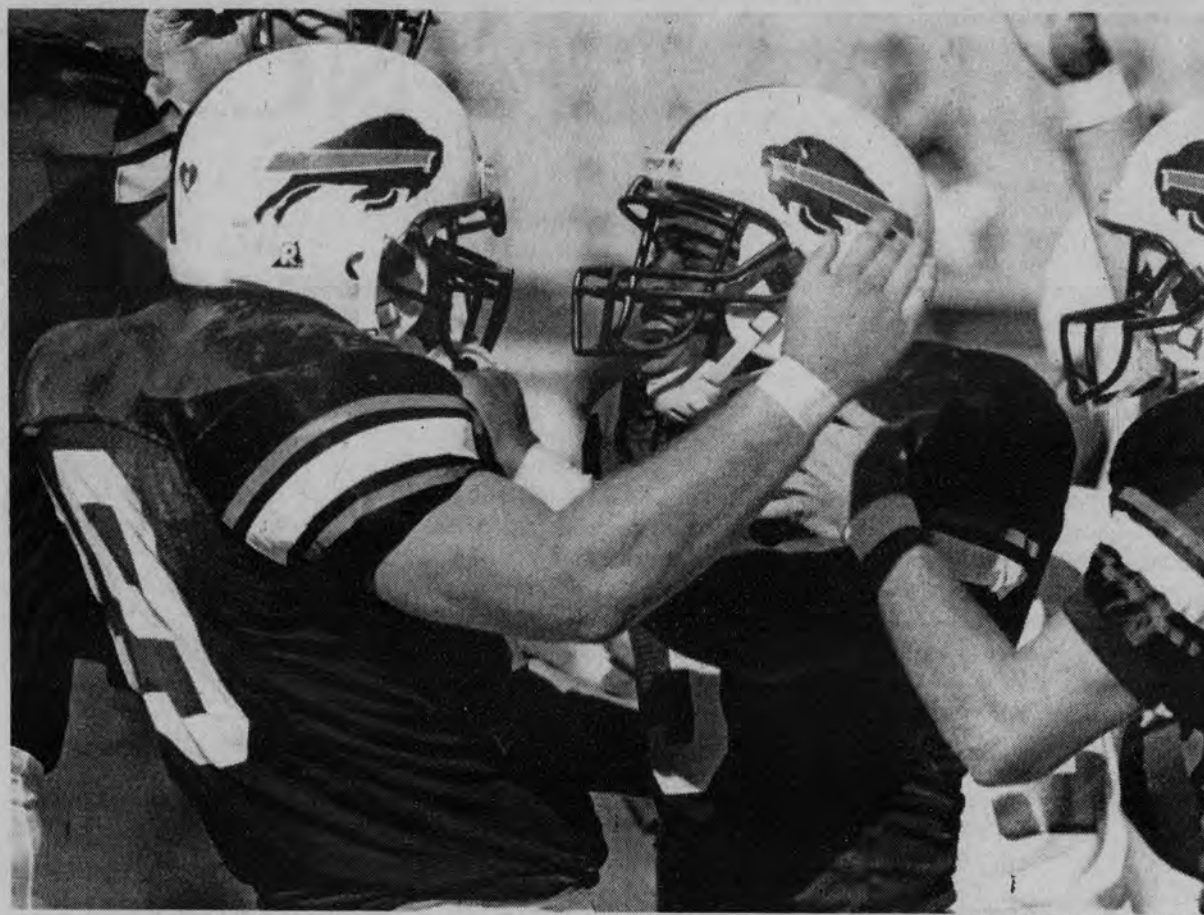

It is obvious that the Bison do not have an easy road to the Patriot League title, but they are doing everything correctly on the football field right now to get themselves there. The Orange and Blue brought an extremely balanced offensive attack into Georgetown University and came away with their first road win of the year, 24-10.

Jabu Powell '02 rushed for 156 yards on 38 carries while Lucas Phillips '01 completed 13 of his 26 pass attempts for 165 yards. This well-balanced offense, along with a swarming defense, gave the Bison what they needed to come away with—the victory.

This game was a defensive struggle for much of the first half, until the Hoyas were able to break through for a touchdown on a 31-yard pass midway through the second quarter. Bucknell answered back on the ensuing drive, going 65 yards, with Powell running in for a five-yard touchdown run.

The Bison finished off the half with another score, this time from the foot of Chris Lundberg '03 with a 26-yard field goal. The Bison took a slim 10-7 lead into the half.

second half with a field goal of their own midway through the third quarter, tying the game at 10.

The Bison would not allow another point the remainder of the game, but would add two more touchdowns themselves. The first of these came on a six-yard burst by Powell. Then, in the beginning of the fourth quarter, Phillips connected for 34 yards with Tim Johnson '04 for the receiver's first collegiate touchdown.

Bucknell added its fifth win of the season against league opponent Lafayette on Saturday. Powell added two more touchdowns runs to his season total and Phillips passed for two more. This, combined with three field goals from Lundberg and a defensive touchdown by Dave Evans '01, gave the Bison a 42-30 victory.

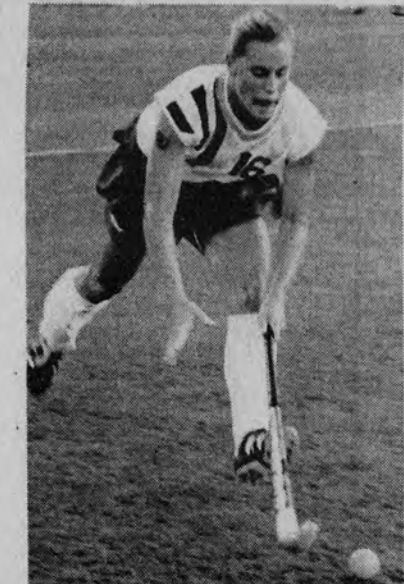

The game did not start out the way that the Bison had hoped. Phillips fumbled the first snap of the day, and Lafayette recovered the ball in the Bison red zone. The Leopards took an early 7-0 lead, but the Bison would fight back.

It looked like there was going to be more bad news for the Bison when Powell went down on his first run from scrimmage, and had to be helped off the field. Phillips was able to move his team down the field without the help of his star runner, and capped off the drive

After a shutout win over Big Ten opponent Indiana (4-0) the Bison fell to no. 12 James Madison (4-1) and no. 6 Penn State (8-1). Despite the losses, Bucknell was pleased with the three-game road trip and the experience they gained from such difficult competition.

"I think playing strong teams like JMU and Penn State will really be beneficial in our upcoming Patriot League games," said junior midfielder Lauren Campbell, who had a goal in each of the three games. "On the whole, we were really satisfied with the way we played against such tough hockey programs."

The Orange and Blue dominated Indiana from the start of the contest. Forward Dena Ebert '02 struck early with an unassisted goal in the first five minutes of play which would turn out to be the game-winner.

The remainder of the first half was scoreless, but the second stanza appeared to be a Bison scoring clinic.

Bucknell came out strong as Campbell netted a goal at the 33-minute mark, adding some insurance to the scoreboard. Indiana was able to temporarily hold off the Bison attack until junior Melissa Maher and Ebert capped off the day's scoring late in the contest, increasing the final tally to 4-0.

The victory over Indiana would be the last the Bison would see in the road stretch. In Harrisonburg, Virginia, James Madison got goals from four different players to quiet Bucknell's feisty efforts. The Orange and Blue played strong throughout the entire match, limiting the Dukes to just one goal in the first half.

Giving the underdogs even more hope, Campbell tied the game with a penalty stroke one minute into play the second half.

James Madison, however, scored on two quick penalty corners, stifling the hopes of a David versus Goliath outcome. The Dukes would add a fourth tally with ten minutes to play in the game.

According to senior tri-captain Maura Higgs, the team was very pleased with their efforts against the 12th ranked team in the nation. "JMU is a great team and we were able to play with them," she said. "It really shows a lot about our team's ability to play with the nation's best."

The road trip ended in State College where it began five days earlier, but this time with opposite results. The Bison suffered defeat at the hands of no. 6 Penn State to the tune of 8-1, marking the second loss to a nationally ranked team in as many games. Campbell managed to score off of a Higgs pass to avoid the shutout, but the Nittany Lions sealed the contest with five unanswered goals in the second half.

The Bison hosted Patriot League foe Colgate on Wednesday and suffered a 3-2 overtime defeat. Campbell sent the game into overtime, scoring off a penalty stroke with 2:21 remaining in regulation. But Colgate found the net with 9:48 remaining in the extra session to claim the victory.

The Bison look to improve their league standing when they host Fairfield this Saturday.

well, making eight saves in the contest, earning her fourth shutout of the season.

"Purse is stepping up more every day," Chandler said. "She is also talking a lot more in the cage."

Bucknell's win over Army advanced the Bison into sole possession of second place in the conference with a 3-1-1 conference record.

The Bison fell to Villanova, 2-1, Wednesday in a non-conference match. Rensselaer put the Bison ahead 1-0 in the early going, but the Wildcats tied the game in the second half. The 1-1 score held into the second overtime period, when Villanova's netted the game-winner at 113:44.

The Bison host Lafayette in a crucial Patriot League game this Saturday.

It would mean a great deal to me for them to be there. The students and the faculty are in much of the university's founding, with the oldest schools entering first. Despite the tireless planning effort, Rogers will lay out his plans for the future in his acceptance speech, entitled "Bucknell University: Honoring the Past, Celebrating the Future." According to Rogers, the speech gives him the chance to "look at our roots and sketch out" his plans for improvement. He is expected to speak about his ten-year plan for the University, tentatively titled "Vision 2010" as well as his plans to bolster the institution's national reputation.

"Inaugurations are typically fun, joy-filled, hopeful occasions; grand moments when a University becomes energized by new leadership and new enthusiasm," Sojka said.

Schubauer said, "This is a big weekend for Bucknell. For the participants, and, most importantly, it's a big weekend for President Rogers. It will be a grand celebration of a new leader, giving him an opportunity to set a tone for the years of his tenure."

Rogers anticipates the inauguration and looks forward to celebrating the day with the campus community. In addition to the faculty, staff, alumni and special guests, Rogers made a special appeal for all students to attend. Personalized invitations were extended to each student through campus mail this week, and Rogers and his wife, Athena, look forward to their

"This is a once in a lifetime experience," Rogers said. "Athena and I are so thrilled that so many people will be involved."

The new president and his wife have made extensive efforts to become fully immersed in campus life and have enjoyed his first few months at the University. "Everything has been exceptional. We've been made to feel so welcome here, and we've experienced immense good will and enthusiasm."

Schubauer has been overwhelmingly satisfied with Rogers' progress thus far. "Everyone on the [presidential search] committee realized that he is a dedicated, open, people-minded person," he said. "He creates a pleasant atmosphere—that's one of the first attributes that drew us to him."

He believes the inauguration marks "the start of a wonderful time for Bucknell and an important time in its history. The opportunities at Bucknell are different than they were in the past years, and we believe he is the right person—and they are the right couple—to lead us."

Howard Zinn urges "active democracy"

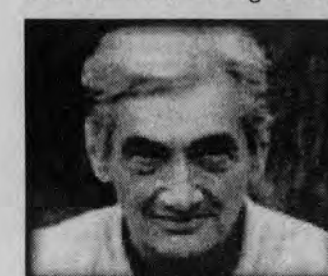

By Rebecca Rowland

This success perfectly illustrates what Zinn means by "bringing democracy alive."

"The three branches of government do not cause change, people cause change," Zinn said.

"Change comes from movements of the people."

While he applauds democracy, Zinn laments the lack of a third party in our country's electoral spectrum—"limited multiple choice" is how he referred to our current system. With only the two major parties represented at the highest level of government, Zinn believes it is up to the people to Zinn gave an educational lecture last Tuesday night at the Weiss Center.

Noted historian Howard Zinn spoke to a receptive audience in the University's Weiss Center Wednesday night. In his lecture entitled "Bringing Democracy Alive," Zinn urged his listeners to become more involved in the democratic process.

A widely known pro-labor, leftist and liberal, Zinn admits to having "a few" radical friends. He has protested with Julian Bond and the NAACP, Martin Luther King Jr., and the Children's Defense Fund and Noam Chomsky against the war in Vietnam.

Likening the current administration at his university to a "tyrannical regime," Zinn and his colleagues first organized and then went on strike during the 1979 academic year in order to gain the improvements in their working conditions that they demanded.

They won.

Bookstore to relocate in spring

By Ryan Delahanty

The Bucknell Bookstore will be closed for winter break and for approximately three weeks thereafter in order to undergo changes. Designed to improve the appearance and also accommodate a more diverse range of products, the renovations will take the majority of second semester.

According to Peggy Plympton, vice president for finance and administration, the Bookstore will be moved to the basement of Hunt, "since the sorority housing on the first floor of Hunt is not fully booked this year."

It was difficult for the administration to find a place big enough to equal nearly two-thirds of the bookstore's capacity, but the basement of Hunt should be sufficient.

On choosing the prime location Plympton said, "the pressures on Hunt Formal are less than they have been in other years, so that seemed like the least imposition, while still being somewhat near the center of campus, and thus somewhat convenient to the folks who use the store."

The move to Hunt signals an inventory on a much smaller scale than Bucknell students are used to seeing.

Plympton said, "the inventory in this space will be less than the current bookstore can carry, since the square footage is smaller ... basically it's not quite half as much space, so there will be less of everything."

Although, textbooks for the spring semester of 2001 will be carried in the bookstore in the LC as to make it easier for students to get their books, as it is already a difficult enough task with the minimal space.

Plympton adds, "The textbook sales for the second semester will be done out of the current

Drinking hits top of annual report

By Jennifer Jenchura

Earlier this month, the University released its Campus Security and Crime Statistics for 1999 indicating that students committed a substantial number of minor offenses related to alcohol.

Although it is still acceptable to think of Bucknell as a safe campus, several sexual offenses were reported. With no major violent offenses, such as robbery, murder, or theft, the majority of offenses were comprised of liquor law violations.

"This is a relatively safe campus, but no community is crime free," said Head of Public Safety Vince DeCerio.

Over 90 percent of sexual offenses, violent offenses, vandalism and fire alarms result from alcohol.

"Most of the offenses affect a preoccupation with alcohol," DeCerio said. "I am not advocating abstinence from drinking, but the same rules here would be enforced if the same thing happened in your neighborhood at home."

Statistics break the reports into 2 categories: arrests and campus disciplinary referrals, which also include official public safety warnings.

The statistics showed an all time high of 170 liquor law violation arrests, compared with 144 in 1998 and just 65 in 1997.

Public Safety continues to diligently work to achieve safety for students, faculty and staff around campus and community.

In a more positive look, campus disciplinary referrals for liquor law violations dropped 35 percent—from 602 reported incidents in 1998 to 381 at present.

Although the numbers give lots of data, DeCerio is cautious about drawing conclusions. "It's hard to tell why some numbers go down and others rise. University supported alcohol awareness programs both on and off campus combined with public safety education and enforcement efforts have served to reduce alcohol violations. However, I will not go so far as to say that the numbers will go down again next year," he said.

DeCerio did confess that Public Safety has been stricter in the past year about enforcing underage drinking violations.

"We use our statistics to identify patterns of problems and crime. Based on that, we revise patrols and have crime prevention workshops to address specific problems," he said.

The Department of Education has required campuses to report crimes for the past 10 years. It stipulates schools must disclose violent crimes, burglaries and auto thefts on campus and arrests for liquor, drug and weapons violations from the past three years. The University's figures may not be accurately reported in the U.S. Department of Education's Office of Post Secondary Education, due to the fact that records were due in August, causing the University to round down some of its figures in the national report. These figures were made to be comparable to other colleges across the country. The law was amended in 1998 requiring the reports to be available on the Internet; the Campus Security Statistics for every college are available at the Office of Postsecondary Education's website.

bookstore space, and they'll be back in that space before textbook sales for next fall happen. So those two big activities will not have to be accommodated in the smaller space, but the 'regular' business of the term will all be in the smaller space."

Plympton answered, "The work that was done in the bookstore over the spring and summer was the bookstore underwent many super-

Paige Gull—The Bucknellian

Jason Dolan '01 was elected the new vice president of the Bucknell Student Government after the sudden promotion of Marsha Lewis '02.

BSG is hoping to better publicize what they have done on campus as well as make BSG a larger part of the University community. They are accomplishing this goal through increased student emails and a new BSG website (a link can be found on the University's home page).

In addition to BSG, Dolan is a management major. He is a member of Phi Kappa Psi and throughout his time at the University he has been an assistant coach for a youth basketball program at the YMCA and a Building on Foundations (BOF) counselor. Tim Reynolds to visit on solo tour

By Trevor Rutledge-Leverenz

Tim Reynolds is much more than Dave Matthews' right hand man. With more than 4 solo CD's, and with the release of his new CD, "See Into Your Soul," Tim is finally launching his own solo acoustic tour. Reynolds is considered one of the greatest musicians ever for his improvisational way of playing the guitar.

Reynolds was born in Weisbaden, Germany, while his parents were on a mission for the Pentecostal Religious Ministry.

He began playing instruments at age 12, when he played the electric bass three times a week for his parents' congregations. When he turned 18, he left home to join a band. After playing with various bands, including disco and country, he settled down in Charlottesville, Va.

It was in Charlottesville where Reynolds opened his musical floodgates, experimenting with various instruments, including the sitar, solo jazz guitar, solo flamenco, twelve string guitar, violin and mandolin.

Reynolds cites a highly varied group of influences, including Carlos Santana, Marilyn Manson, Bob Marley and Led Zeppelin.

In 1993, Reynolds met up with a certain musician by the name of Dave Matthews. Matthews was looking for an outlet for his music while he wasn't touring with the band, and playing acoustically with Reynolds seemed to be a very viable option.

"The first time I met Tim," said Matthews in an interview posted on TimReynolds.com. "I was working at a bar in Charlottesville, and I heard this incredible symphony. I looked up to see this short, little guy playing this big guitar and making all of these incredible noises."

They played smaller locations than DMB normally played, keeping the attendance below 2000 to forge a stronger relationship between the musicians and the audience. They have toured together three times, and Reynolds has been a guest on all the DMB CD's. But with a solo tour of his own, Reynolds stands to become more than "the guy playing with Dave."

Reynolds will be in Selinsgrove on Sunday, the 29th, at the Weis Center.

Annual Million Penny Project under way

The Interfraternity and Panhellenic Councils and the Office of Greek Life at Bucknell University have announced the kick-off to the second annual One Million Penny Project to raise one million pennies ($10,000) between now and Nov. 18 to support the Foundation for Student Giving, based in Selinsgrove.

Last year the project raised $14,700 for the Elizabeth L. Glaser Pediatric AIDS foundation in California. Eric Green, Interfraternity Council philanthropy and community service chair at Bucknell, hopes to surpass last year's record-breaking fund raiser, the largest fund-raising program in the Greek system's 145-year history.

Bucknell's 20 fraternities and sororities will be using a variety of mechanisms to collect the one million pennies. Donations will be solicited from the university and local communities in an effort to raise the awareness of the FSG. Collection canisters will be placed throughout the local area; students will be soliciting donations; and the student organizations will be conducting various types of fund-raising events.

In announcing the campaign, Green said, "The Foundation for Student Giving serves many agencies in the Susquehanna Valley and that the project will raise the general public's awareness about the foundation."

Meredith Alan, president of the Panhellenic Council said, "I am very proud to be a member of the Greek community at Bucknell. This effort will remind people that Greeks can be productive on a college or university campus. The Greek women at Bucknell will do their part in this project."

Roy Baker, assistant dean of students, added, "The Greek community at Bucknell continues to contribute to the university and local community. I believe we can reach and maybe even surpass this goal with the help of the surrounding communities."

Keith Hofmann, president of the Interfraternity Council stated that, "everyone has pennies; most people just put them in some kind of container in their homes. It is time to bring them out and put them to work for a good cause."

Mike Flock, director of the FSG, spoke to the Interfraternity and Panhellenic Councils at Bucknell saying that he was "pleased and excited that the Bucknell Greeks had selected the foundation as the recipient of this year's One Million Penny Project event."

The Foundation for Student Giving (FSG) helps students understand the concept of giving to others. It believes that by educating students about ways to give to others, it can help develop values in young adults that they might not otherwise be exposed to in their lives. The foundation believes that by providing exposure to the benefits of giving, coupled with a real life experience in which they are empowered to positively affect the lives of others, the seed will be planted by which the students are more apt to continue to perform acts of giving for a lifetime.

The FSG is a non-profit, tax-exempt organization. Donations can be made directly to the project by contacting Baker at Bucknell University, Lewisburg, PA 17837 or by calling 570-577-1602 to arrange for donations to be picked up. Flock can be reached at the Snyder County Trust Co. in Selinsgrove. While the campaign is called the "One Million Penny Project" donations in the form of nickels, dimes, quarters and bills are welcome.

Bombing shakes Sri Lanka

Sri Lankan police investigate the remnants of the last week's suicide-bombing.

By Amanda Kaufman

Three American women and 21 Sri Lanka residents were wounded in a suicide bombing on Thursday. The bomber died on the spot, while a policeman and a civilian died later. The American women, whose hometowns are not known, were traveling in a car when the blast occurred near Town Hall.

The attack took place as President Chandrika Kumaratunga was swearing in the nation's new government. Police suspected a Cabinet minister might have been the intended target because the Cabinet ministers were expected to pass by the area of the incident.

Kumaratunga's People's Alliance (PA) won the national elections on Oct. 10. However, they were six seats short of gaining the majority in the 225-member house. The National Unity Alliance and the Eelam People's Democratic Party agreed to form a coalition government. The opposition United National Party (UNP) won 89 seats.

Thursday's attack has been attributed to the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), a rebel group. The LTTE have been at war with the government since 1983. They are attempting to carve out a homeland for the Tamil minority in the northern and eastern regions of Sri Lanka. An estimated 63,000 people have died in the fighting.

Bombings by the rebels have been common in Colombo, the capitol of Sri Lanka. One suicide bombing last December left President Kumaratunga blind in one eye. More than forty people have been killed in attacks, allegedly by the Tamil Tigers, at two election rallies prior to the Oct. 10 poll.

The LTTE, who are outlawed in Sri Lanka, the United States and India, usually do not claim responsibility for suicide bombings. But, they do acknowledge having a suicide-bombing unit.

In the two days following the elections, fresh fighting between government troops and Tamil rebels claimed 14 lives. Nine of the casualties were rebels and five were soldiers. Two other skirmishes were reported in northern Sri Lanka.

When the parliamentarians met Wednesday, they overwhelmingly approved an extension of the national emergency measures. The emergency measures have been in force for long periods during the 17-year civil war. National emergency, which must be renewed with a vote in Parliament every month, allows the armed forces to search homes and detain anyone suspected of involvement with the Tamil Tigers.

The suicide-bombing incident was not the only recent tragedy in Sri Lanka. A Tamil journalist was shot to death in Jaffna, a city at the heart of Sri Lanka's civil war, where he had reported on vote rigging and intimidation during the recent parliamentary elections.

Mayilwagani Nimalarajan, 40, who reported for BBC's Tamil language service and worked for Colombo's Tamil language daily, Virakesari, was in his study working on a news report when gunmen shot him through a window Thursday night. A grenade hurled into the house injured his parents and his 11-year-old nephew.

According to the Associated Press, "Ni-malarajan was one of the few sources of independent news from the Jaffna peninsula, where journalists are not allowed free access."

The rebels from the LTTE want Jaffna, a city 185 miles north of Colombo, to become the capital of their proposed homeland for the minority Tamils. By Saturday, the government won back ground lost in this week's round of battles with the Tamil Tigers in the Jaffna peninsula. "We have recaptured three bunker positions and have cleared the area where the fighting developed," military spokesman Brig. Sanath Kumaratunga told Reuters in Colombo.

In addition to the suicide bombing, the Tigers also launched an attack on Thursday near the key town of Nagar Kovil. This town forms part of the peninsula's southernmost government army defenses. Thursday's battles killed 20 rebels and four soldiers. Thirteen additional soldiers were killed in Friday's battle to regain lost territory.

When the navy thwarted a beach landing by the LTTE's naval wing, 80 rebels were killed in ground fighting and 15 guerrillas died in the naval battle.

The attack on Nagar Kovil ends a relative period of quiet on the peninsula which earlier saw about 800 troops and rebels killed during a month-long parliamentary election campaign as the two warring sides jostled for territory.

The Associated Press, Reuters and CNN.com contributed to this report.

Campaigner in Chief?

By Josh Guyan

The hot question this week seems to be whether President Clinton should take a larger role in campaigning for Al Gore. Clinton has taken the initiative in touting the administration's record for the past eight years in support of Gore's presidential run.

Clinton does not feel Gore is communicating the economic record of the administration or the vast differences in policy proposals between the Democratic and Republican tickets. The Gore team is worried about the effects of an increased role for Clinton. This has been the vice president's stand since the Democratic National Convention when he announced that he was running as his own man.

Despite this, the president has taken it upon himself to promote the vice president and criticize Governor George W. Bush. The tour through New York this past weekend was just the latest in a series of speeches and engagements where the president has taken time to blast Bush's record and proposals and praise the accomplishments of his administration.

There are compelling arguments for and against a greater role for the president in the campaign. The pros lie largely in Clinton's popularity among certain groups and his significant political savvy. He is extremely popular among women and African Americans, both groups that must have a large turnout for a Gore victory.

The vice president has enjoyed a significant lead in the polls among women until recently. Support from this group waned after the last debate when Gore reverted to his alpha male posturing. He is still ahead with women, but President Clinton could probably solidify Gore's lead with that group. The vice president's support among African Americans is less enthusiastic and he has lost some support due to the school voucher debate. It is possible President Clinton could help solidify Gore's support in the inner cities among minorities.

Perhaps the most compelling reason for using Clinton in the campaign is his sheer political prowess. Not only does the President have excellent command of all the issues, but he is considered a master of political campaign strategy. He is also one of the best communicators in recent history.

The disadvantages for increased involvement by Clinton in the campaign include the possibility of turning certain voters off and serving as ammunition for Republican attacks. It is very likely that independent swing voters are turned off by the scandal and partisan rhetoric that the president represents.

Republican operatives were licking their chops this week on the Sunday morning talk shows when discussing the possibility of their favorite target returning to the political main stage. Republicans and Bush would use the opportunity to reinvigorate the debate on morality and scandal in Washington.

The polls in this area slightly favor not using the president. A recent CNN/USA Today Gallup Poll asked if voters were more or less likely to vote for Gore if Clinton campaigned for him. They responded 40 percent less likely, 17 percent more likely, and 40 percent said it would have no effect.

This poll would show Gore has little to gain and a lot to lose if he decides to use Clinton. While the vice president has been gaining in recent polls against Bush and he has pulled even, he still has ground to make up. Gore does not want to use Clinton. He would rather win the election on his own without worrying about getting painted with the same morally reprehensible brush as Clinton. Most likely, he will avoid it until it is absolutely necessary. Should he be even or behind a week before the election, he may have to, as Time Magazine reporter Tamila Edwards said today, "Let the dog out."

It is estimated that NASDAQ has lost a full one-fifth of its value in less than one month.

Stock Market getting nervous

By Michael Boland

It is old news that the economy is cruising along, unemployment is low and inflation is in check. But this quarter, the stock fortunes of several prominent companies have demonstrated that financial tranquility is a fragile thing. One bad earnings report, or even a rumor of a bad earnings report can disrupt whatever a company had attained. When this happens to enough companies, it can throw the entire financial market into disarray. That is precisely what happened earlier this month.

NASDAQ, the stock listing for many of today's hi-tech stocks and fastest-growing companies, has been taking a serious beating. Reuters news agency estimates NASDAQ has lost a full one-fifth of its value in less than one month. Explanations have varied, but most of them begin with the lower-than-expected earnings reports starting in late September. Questions about the solvency of these companies caused a massive sell-off in the stocks of important firms in key sectors of the technology industry.

"Stocks are valued at an expectation of future earnings," Greg Krohn, Bucknell University associate professor of economics explained. "If earnings don't meet those expectations, investors will revise their expectations of future performance downwards."

Poor performance in one quarter may create a lack of faith in a firm's ability to be profitable down the road. It makes people less willing to invest in that company's stock, and makes those who hold the stock anxious to sell it. Apple Computer is an example of such a company, and how one firm's bad news can spread to affect others. Apple had warned investors before earnings reports came out that the news would not be good. But as it turned out, the figures could not even meet these lowered expectations. With the company appearing to be "in trouble," Apple became an undesirable stock, and investors sold it off en masse, decreasing the value of the company. IBM, Xerox and Intel have all had similar experiences in the past month. When investors saw that all three of these firms were struggling, questions were raised about the long-term prospects of the entire home computer industry. Consequently, the panic spread, dumping Compaq, Hewlett-Packard and Sun Microsystems for serious losses.

These are all strong companies, and they will survive. But not all firms can be so sure. Smaller companies, most specifically newborn Internet startups, are suffering from the bad press that their big brothers are generating.

Many dot-coms have already gone under, and more look to be on their way out. On Oct. 6, Razorfish.com lost 43 percent of its total worth upon publication of bleak earnings data. Similarly, NASDAQ firm Veco Instruments, producer of semiconductor equipment, lost over one-third of its value in just one day of trading, for the same reason. Priceline.com took a serious hit; its value fell 58 percent over the week of Oct. 1-5, making an already terrible year even worse.

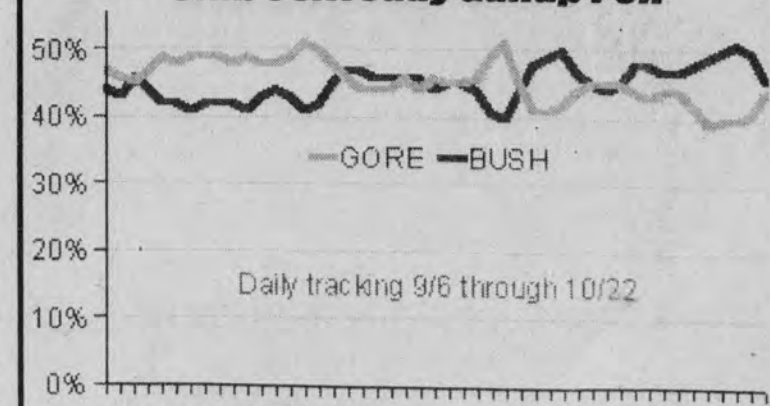

Meanwhile, NASDAQ giant Microsoft provided a bit of good news; earlier this month it reported that its earnings would actually be higher than expected. That helped matters, but not enough. NASDAQ, laced with technology and information firms, could not shake up such across-the-board losses by so many of its firms. Consequently the market showed huge losses. On Friday, Oct. 6, NASDAQ closed at 3361.01, its lowest point level in over three months.

Lackluster sales figures were then complemented by government data revealing inflationary economic trends. On Oct. 7, the Labor Department released word that unemployment had dropped to 3.9 percent, a 30-year low-good news, under most circumstances. Unfortunately, this news scared the stock market, as fears mounted that low unemployment, an inflationary force, would cause Alan Greenspan to crack down on business.

Again, expectations are everything, and the fear was that low unemployment meant higher wages, higher costs, higher consumer prices and inflation. The threat of higher interest rates, which makes it more expensive for business to invest and grow, scared the market even more. Investors bailed out on certain tech stocks, causing further troubles for the market in general and NASDAQ in particular. Greenspan has left rates untouched for now, but Krohn believes that he may not be done. Any actions taken "will depend on the course of inflation, employment and production in the near future," he said.

Read next week's election spectacular.

Students should show support for Rogers

This weekend's inauguration of Steffen Rogers as the University's 15th President brings forward a new dynamic to the campus. Rogers, who has been on campus since early summer, has gone to great lengths, along with his wife, Athena, to acclimate themselves to their new home. Through their efforts, the Rogers' have proven to be the hands-on, thoroughly involved couple that the Presidential Search Committee had hoped for.

With these efforts aside, Rogers' plans now come to the forefront. In his acceptance speech, entitled "Bucknell University: Honoring Our Past, Celebrating Our Future," Rogers is expected to lay the guidelines for a ten-year plan along with a new strategic plan aimed at improving the University's national notoriety. These plans and others will help to solidify Rogers' vision for our future, and the scheduling of the ceremony during Homecoming Weekend gives him the opportunity to spread these ideas throughout numerous constituencies.

All eyes will be on President Rogers and the University, with representatives from higher learning institutions from around the world attending along with community members. This weekend's events, which include the groundbreaking of the new multimillion dollar athletic complex, give the University a great opportunity to showcase itself and its new leader.

Rogers said last week that he hopes, above all, that students attend the inauguration. He said that he and Athena have been so drawn to students thus far and hope that they will share in the celebration. Their special appeal to the student body shows a changing face within the administration, a face that will become more visible this weekend.

While many will be quick to compare Rogers to our former president, William D. Adams (as The Bucknellian did in our first editorial this fall), this event marks a time for us to focus on our new president and the objectives for his tenure. Rogers' extensive background in higher education proves his worthiness to be our president, and his actions thus far have only reinforced his strong commitment to the University and its students.

This weekend will be a true celebration. The Bucknellian once again applauds President Rogers' efforts thus far and wishes him the best of luck in his inauguration and mapping the future of the University. The Bucknellian also urges students to attend the festivities and show support for our president.

Sick college students have few options to improve their health

By Kristen Jancuk

Back in high school, students lived for two things: sick days and snow days. A parent's worst nightmare. However, when you get to college, you probably noticed that it's not quite the same. There are no snow days. It doesn't matter if every school within a 50 miles is buried under eight feet of snow, you will attend class. And being sick isn't what it used to be.

No one enjoys being sick, of course, but there were certainly some benefits. You woke up with a little snuffle and temperature of 99.5 degrees and suddenly you could spend all day watching soap operas, eating soup and reading trashy magazines while mom waited on you hand and foot.

What is there to enjoy about being sick now? No one waits on you. In fact, the only way you get food is if you drag your tired feverish body to the LC.

There's nothing more enjoyable than trying to eat food you can't even taste (this may, in fact, be the one and only benefit) in a noisy, crowded cafeteria while your head is pounding and your stomach churning, whether it be from the food or your illness.

Take solace in the fact that since you were forced to struggle to the LC on your deathbed so you didn't starve, you will now contaminate half the campus with your disease and everyone else can suffer too.

Getting to class is a different story. While you could be absent a few days in high school and still miss nothing in class, now missing one class can mean struggling to catch up for the rest of the semester.

It also never fails that the one day you miss, you will have a quiz or the professor will decide to explain in detail the format, questions and maybe even the answers for the next exam.

Professors usually allow at most three unexcused absences. I get sick three times a month, thanks to these crowded stuffy dorms spilling over with viruses and bacteria. Of course, e-mailing to say you're sick just won't cut it. The only way to remedy this situation is to get a written excuse from a doctor. Yippee.

I don't know about most people, but I certainly don't go running to the doctor every time I have a sniffle or a fever. We learned years ago that doctors can't give you anything for a cold or flu that you can't get at the drugstore. And when I'm coughing up one of my lungs, the last thing I want to do is drag myself across campus in the rain (it always rains when you're sick) to the Health Center.

On the off chance that I do crawl over there, there is never a doctor, regardless of the time of the day.

I've also discovered that for the most part, the Health Center can only diagnose two illnesses: strep throat and the Ebola virus. Everything else they're a little hazy on and just throw antibiotics at you. At least if you're lucky you can get that note you need excusing you from class.

Thanks to our location in the beautiful Susquehanna Valley, the TV reception here is, well, not quite up to par, so you can forget about watching your soaps, even if you have a TV. You could go down to the lounge to watch, but who has the energy to battle it out with the shady guy who insists on flipping back and forth between reruns of "Sailor Moon" and a thrilling documentary about the eating habits of the hippopotamus?

Now, after exerting all this energy trying to stay healthy and alive, all you want to do is crawl into bed and never wake up. Good luck.

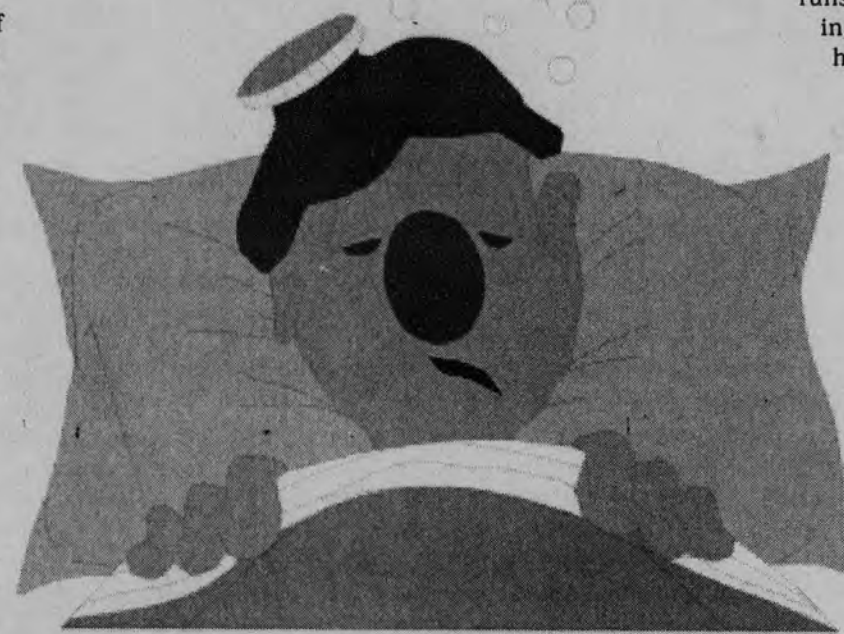

Try resting, when your roommates are hopping around doing "Tae-bo" (complete with huffing, puffing and grunting as seen on TV) and listening to some really soothing music, like DMX or Korn. You'd have a better chance of falling asleep on the football field—in the middle of a game.

Even if you don't have roommates, your hallmates and dorm probably aren't going to be very accommodating either, especially that guy that lives below you whose idea of a good time is shaking your entire room with his bass system.

And there will, of course, be a fire alarm.

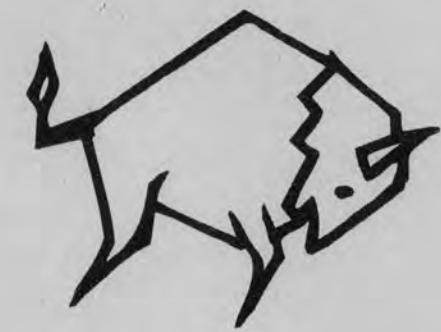

The University spends lots of money on things that we never use (like the smoothie bar that is never open) so why not use money for something helpful that will be used, like a service to aide sick students?

Bring us food, medicine and trashy magazines. Make us turkey soup and buy us those soft Kleenex with lotion in them. Find a doctor who makes house calls. And, for the love of all that is sacred, be quiet about it.

Do you want to be the next student to "Lock Horns?"

Embrace the right to vote!

American youth must overcome voter apathy in upcoming Presidential election

By Matthew Hinson

In less than one month, the most powerful nation on earth will choose a new course, through its presidential and congressional elections. However, predicted voter apathy is very high, especially among younger voters who feel alienated by the political machines.

What is the cause of this seeming lack of appreciation and respect for the greatest weapon ever granted, the right to vote? What leads us to feel so estranged? Perhaps we are too complacent, too comfortable. Then wouldn't we want to ensure that this continued? Somehow it is not that simple.

Call them cynical, call them unpatriotic, call them what you will. America's young, taken as a whole, do not vote on a regular basis. Much of this is blamed on politician's not addressing issues important to the young people, issues of significance to our generation.

America's youth doesn't worry as much about taxes as the middle aged citizens do, Social Security and similar programs seem far off, and many of the others passed, expecting liars and cheats for politicians. Granted, to some degree this has been expected by every generation of American voters, but today's young voters seem more disaffected with the democratic process.

Yet this isn't necessarily the case all around. On the other hand, many feel that as long as their freedoms are not being bla-ffiliated with the democratic process.

And the people I've had the honor of working with have taught me lessons I'll never forget. I'm sure I'll remember the pressure of deadlines, the hours of conflict resolution and planning and, most importantly, my interaction with the campus.

It's been difficult so far, but in time I'll be able to look back with pride at my time with The Bucknellian, even though it may have taken away from my normal life. For those of you who have taken the time to read this, I thank you. And I thank you for your comments, criticisms and praise over the past year.

Most of all, I give thanks to the people who have helped make the paper a success: to my co-editor, Heather Napolitano '01, who helped me realize my strengths as well as my shortcomings, and whose enormous talent made it possible for me to walk away with confidence; to Matt Albert '01, whose tireless effort helped me through a seemingly endless spring semester; to my successor, Pete Van Emburgh '02, whose remarkable efforts helped keep me focused during the hardest of times; and to Rebecca Rowland '02, whose innovations and creativity helped keep me determined to strive for improvement.

Most importantly, I thank our adviser Jim Lee, a man whose work here goes far too unnoticed. Without his guidance and support, I would never have been able to make it this far. He has been a mentor, supporter and friend to me through the most strenuous time in my life, and for that I will be eternally grateful.

Their presence made my job enjoyable and fulfilling, and because of them and many others, The Bucknellian has reached its highest-ever level of success.

It's strange to think of myself as anything but the editor-in-chief. It's scary thinking about moving on, especially now that I have more time to live the life of a senior, something that has eluded me so far this fall. Now I will have more time to focus on the present and the future, to get my grades back on track and make a decision about my career goals, to catch up on my sleep and clear my mind.

But my time, no matter how trying, has been well spent. I can't let myself look back with anything but happiness and satisfaction. And thanks.

In essence, the presence of Sharon in the government will cause the peace process, already in serious doubt of resuming, to collapse permanently.

As Ziad Abu Amr, a Palestinian political analyst told the Associated Press, "Sharon is simply not interested in the peace process."

However, if his demands are not met, Sharon has threatened Barak that he will press Parliament to topple the present government and proceed with new elections, in which former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has a better chance of winning than does Barak.

The question for the Prime Minister is what is more important to him—his own political survival or peace in the region.

Furthermore, is Barak willing to accept Sharon's type of blackmail politics in order to keep his governmental position?

Considering the recent events and Barak's own statements to the press, the answer is "yes."

On Israeli radio, Barak appealed to the state's diverse political parties to join in an emergency coalition government.

"Friends, this is a time of emergency, and in an emergency, brothers walk together," he said.

The emergency to which he is referring is the continued violence between the Palestinians and the Israeli army.

Understandably, Barak would not tell his fellow citizens that he needs this coalition to strengthen his slipping hold on the government leadership.

The existing problem between the Palestinians and the Israeli army is such an easy scapegoat. He cited that an emergency government will effectively kill the peace process.

It would imply to the Palestinian leadership that Barak has given up on negotiations. Sharon insists that the only possible way he will enter the coalition is if he is granted advance agreement on policy positions.

As if that is not enough, diplomatic and security policies must be agreed upon, which will assume the tone of Sharon's own nationalistic opinions. Silvan Shalom, a leader of Sharon's Likud Party, said, "If he wants us in the government, we must be able to have a real influence on the diplomatic process."

A smiling frog, complete with a thick moustache and sombrero, leans nonchalantly against a lamp-post above the door of 214 Market Street. An unusual sign, but it fits the location, for Señor Frog isn't the typical downtown shop.

Filled wall-to-wall with treasures from far-off lands and steeped in the subtle scents of cedar and incense, this tiny store in the heart of Lewisburg has much to offer.

Originally a Southwestern and Mexican specialty shop, Señor Frog has expanded to include merchandise from all corners of the world: Egypt, Indonesia, Poland and Pakistan, to name a few.

"We just look for the unusual," owner Tammy Winters explained. And, indeed, there is something for everyone, from young children to their grandparents.

Next to a display of Grateful Dead baby clothes and new sixth edition beanie bears rest intricately carved wooden boxes, tapestries, hand blown glass sculptures, miniature Buddhas, and a wide array of gag-gifts... not to mention the frogs.

When it comes to these popular green amphibians, if Señor Frog doesn't have it, it probably doesn't exist. Frog merchandise brightens every corner-stuffed animals, figurines, T-shirts, jewelry and touchingly painted as well.

Señor Frog's unique charm is augmented by soft background music, and the layout is relaxed and welcoming, with a distinct international flavor. The overall impression is one of a beautifully kept attic holding invaluable prizes for the discriminating eye.

One could browse for hours without seeing everything, despite the store's small size, and through a beaded curtain and past a row of sweet sounding chimes is yet another point of interest: a collection of women's embroidered Indian clothing and exotic furnishings suitable for home or a dorm room.

Open from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Saturday, Señor Frog is stocked and ready for the holiday season. It is a place where one can have a hopping good time, take a moment to see sights from abroad, and find the perfect present for that special someone who seems to have everything.

Wink Thinks

Dear Wink,

I am sure that you have heard of the "freshman fifteen," as it seems to be a little extra baggage that college freshmen, especially girls, pick up during their first semester. The freshman fifteen was something that I seriously feared my senior year in high school, mainly because I didn't want to come home over winter break looking like the poster girl for Jenny Craig. As a result of this intense fear of gaining weight I work out nearly every day, and try to eat as healthfully as possible.

Please don't get the impression that I have some sort of eating disorder because that is definitely not the case! I love food. When I was looking at colleges I distinctly remember the tour guide taking us through the Cafeteria and pointing out all of the options that were available to the students.

Therefore, I remember thinking that this seemed like a place where I could get a variety of healthy things to eat. However, during the first month of school this year I have gained a whopping 20 pounds and look nothing like my former self. To put it mildly, I am sure that the food I am being served is pure fat and is extremely unhealthy for me. While the tour guides of Bucknell may show that there are a lot of things to choose from, they neglected to mention that the menu all tastes the same, and it is all unhealthy.

I want desperately to fit in and be good looking, but I just can't manage it for whatever reason. Additionally, is there someone I can talk to about the slop I am being served?

Sincerely,
Packing On The Pounds

Dear Packing On The Pounds,

Let me tell you tell you that you have my sympathy, as I am forced to eat the so-called "food" that the cafeteria serves on a daily basis as I am a proud member of the fraternity meal plan. It seems as though a majority of the girls at Bucknell gain a few extra pounds during their years here, and I don't think it's just from sipping 40s.

Additionally, most people around the Bucknell campus exercise compulsively, so where all of this extra weight could be coming from? Why don't you take a wild guess and pin it on the food we eat.

I am really sorry to hear that you are having such trouble dealing with the fact that you are gaining weight, because it seems to me that you are doing everything in your power to avoid such gains. You walk into the Cafeteria and suddenly you feel a sense of nausea because everything seems to smell the same, but it all looks different. Go figure. What's even more puzzling is when you seem to miraculously have the same food for lunch as you did for dinner the night before.

There are a couple of options that you could try. Number one on my list is to eat in The Bison. You can actually choose what you want to eat, even if you do have to pay all the money you saved over the summer for a sandwich.

Additionally, you will have to deal with the apparent loss of self-esteem you will suffer after ordering your food, from the onslaught of negative energy that surrounds that place. Honestly, I have never felt so bad about myself in my life as I did when asking if I could have a little extra lettuce. So that is one possibility for you if you are willing to endure the pain.

If you really feel that strongly about the problems that you are encountering, I urge you to talk to one of the deans about them. This may be the only way that you can get what you actually want-healthy food that won't make you fat. Take your complaints to Dining Services. But stop using the comment cards. Try calling the managers or sending them emails. That way, they will have to listen to you. And perhaps, while you are at it, you can help your fellow students.

If you are interested in writing to Wink there is no need to worry—all questions are confidential and answers are always thorough. However, please write questions that are decent because we can't include material that is libelous or an invasion of privacy. Questions or comments can be sent to Eli Winkler at box 22815, attn: Wink Thinks. Please note that Wink Thinks is meant to be instructional as well as entertaining. However, it is in no way a substitute for professional counseling.

With Halloween just around the corner, many people are probably planning their costumes and brushing up on their ghost stories. However, for many young women who live in Hunt Hall, or "Haunt Hall," as some call it, every day can be a real life ghost story.

Bucknell students and faculty have been witnessing strange phenomena, supposedly caused by a female ghost, for over two decades. Some say the ghost is the spirit of a former student who died in a buggy accident during the early history of the college; another rumor suggests that it is the spirit of a woman who fell in a nearby stream and drowned while waiting for her parents to pick her up.

While no one is absolutely sure of the ghost's origin, it is the general consensus among the Bucknell community and those who have researched the legend, that the ghost is a female student who was killed in a car accident in 1965 while returning to Bucknell from home.

A former Resident Advisor of Hunt Hall, who apparently lived on the third floor of Hunt with the young woman, described the story as she remembers it to a local newspaper that ran an article on going on or something.

Anyhow, we all piled into the family Renault to seek out the "commercial center." While arriving, I noticed a gigantic crane and a small man yelling at a group of onlookers.

Dangling from the crane was a long fluorescent cord. I couldn't believe it! I came all the way from the United States and found French bungee jumping behind a shopping mall!

The brothers jumped and succeeded. The parents were ecstatic. It was a family event; they took pictures and stayed.

During my stay, I would sometimes stray from the family and eat in little cafes that served espressos and played French radio while the patrons conversed and watch the streets. The servings at such cafes were always proportional to the richness and taste of the dish.

And the meals at restaurants were sensational, complemented by sandwiches filled with delicious hams and cheeses or fluffy, airy Moroccan couscous that melted inside your mouth. I was always satisfied. I remember enjoying lush cream sauces served with sizzling chicken or lamb outside on sunny beautiful Sunday afternoons with children playing in the streets.

The French are protective of their culture and gastronomy; they point.

I met a French girl this summer in New York and over dinner she expressed her discomfort in American restaurants. "It's all too fast. I don't have time to relax!" After spending enough time in France, I can understand, especially when a waiter takes my salad plate before I've finished.

My dinners at the home of my host family were fairly most delicious French cheeses. The tastes ranged from the mild and soft Camembert and Brie to the older and more tart goat cheeses such as Chevre and blue cheeses such as Roquefort. The cheeses come from many different regions in France from Normandy to the French Alps.

The dinner process seemed to parallel the conversation. As the courses were served, conversation would pick up. In a way, the food would stimulate and perpetuate a he was replaced. We finally made it to the match between Paris St. Germain and FC Gueugnon. PSG was heavily favored. Their fans had all sorts of fireworks and banners.

Soccer fans in Europe are known for blaring chants and rude behavior and we were not at all disappointed. I learned a couple of the words and I really enjoyed shouting them, especially at the referee. Gueugnon had never played in Paris, or in front of 80,000 screaming fans but incredibly, they won 2-0. The place erupted afterwards and the police arrived in full riot gear.

The subway back to Paris was packed with people chanting and pushing. I imagined the train careening out of control crashing into the underground depths. Fortunately, we survived and managed to get to the hotel room safely.

When I reflect on the year, a fantastic blur of highlights and faces runs through my mind, and I savor them. Eight months created quite a few memories, and taught me a lot about a culture beyond my own.

Halloween house of horrors here on campus: Hunt Hall

There are many myths and stories behind the ghost, and what exactly she does when she "haunts" Hunt Hall. One very popular story is that she appears every two or three years asking for help, wearing either a red or green raincoat. The ghost is often blamed for turning on lights and stereos, opening and slamming cupboards, hiding custodian's tools, rearranging rooms, and other mischievous acts.

Custodians claim that the ghost's presence is the strongest in summer, when Hunt Hall is vacant. Many of them say that their tools disappear, lights are turned on by themselves, and a faint perfume can apparently be smelled when the ghost passes by.

Strange events have happened to students as well. A woman who lived in Hunt Hall two years ago was complaining one night that a hallway light was keeping her awake. The next morning, she awoke to see that the window above her door had been painted black inside and out. Her room had been locked and no one confessed to the painting.

That same year, another student recalls waking up one day to see a transparent hand reaching for her face. Suddenly, a bottle of pills fell off her dresser and a stereo down the hall that had just been turned off began to blare music.

Over the years, other students have reported having stereos turn on by themselves, CDs fly around the room, and posters taken off the wall and stacked face up on the floor; one student even claims that her disconnected phone began to ring under her bed. It is also a common rumor that the ghost will slip into a dress if it is hung on the back of a door.

This semester alone, many Hunt residents claim to have encountered the ghost. One woman described how she was taking a shower late one night, in the shower stall where there is also a sink. The water in the sink kept turning on; she would exit the shower to turn it off but it would go back on as soon as she got back in the shower. She continued to get out and turn the water off, but it kept going back on when she returned to her shower. Was this just a problem with the building's old pipes, or was the ghost responsible for this act of mischief?

When she got down, the futon was all where there is also a sink. I have had two ghost experiences in Hunt 402. In the first one, I was lying in bed and all of a sudden my closet door went from completely shut to wide open. I went to the suite to sit with my roommate, Bonnie, and we both heard footsteps in the hall but no one was there.

The second time, I was watching a movie in my room one afternoon and all of a sudden the tape stopped, rewound, ejected and both the television and VCR shut off.

Other girls have had experiences up here in the Delta Gamma suite.

We have been told that Pam, the ghost, was a resident here and she received a prank call one night telling her that her parents had died. On the way home, she was killed in a car accident.

I am a resident of Hunt myself, and several of my friends have joked about using an Ouija board to "contact" the ghost on Halloween. While the idea sounds intriguing and even informative, I strongly doubt that any of them will actually go through with it. What exactly is it that they are afraid of?

You decide.

Kimber Gallo '01 and I moved to Hunt our sophomore year. On one of the first nights there, I woke up and noticed our futon was pulled out, and there was a person sleeping there with blankets and everything. I went back to sleep, assuming that it was just a friend

You'll like As You Like It

The 23-member cast will perform the adaptation of Shakespeare's play throughout the weekend.

By Kacy O'Brien

Where can you find a magical forest, the latest technology and a bunch of your friends? On the stage of the Harvey M. Powers Theatre in Coleman Hall at 8 p.m. this Friday through Monday, the Department of Theatre and Dance presents Shakespeare's As You Like It.

Under the direction of Dr. Susan L. Chast, a visiting director and faculty member this year, As You Like It will take on aspects of modern-day mania, including spying, surveillance, and commercial wrestling, while retaining classic language through a truly timeless script. Chast focuses on the differences between the court—where everything up through the latest video technology is present—and the forest—a magical, mystical place, where love, friendship, and issues of self-identity are explored and allowed to bloom.

A basic plot: Rosalind's father was banished by her uncle, Duke Frederick, the father of her dearest friend and cousin, Celia. The two are nearly inseparable, until Rosalind meets Orlando, a young descendant and angry man, whose elder brother has denied him the noble rights to which he was born. Rosalind and Orlando fall immediately in love, and Duke Frederick, who dislikes Orlando for defeating his prize wrestler and does not trust his niece, banishes Rosalind from the court. Celia leaves with her, unable to part with her best friend. The two girls prepare, bringing along the court clown. Rosalind is disguised as a man and both of the girls under false names.

Orlando, to escape his brother's tyranny and the wrath of the Duke, also escapes to Arden, where, lovesick for his dear Rosalind, he hangs poetry upon every tree. Rosalind soon discovers Orlando is also in the forest, but does not reveal herself. Instead, she befriends Orlando, while coaching him on how to woo his love.

The cast is large—23 in all, working side-by-side with student technicians and faculty to produce the show—a collaborative effort, indeed. Brandon Dust, '01, who plays the tyrant brother, Oliver, commented on the size of the cast:

"When working with a cast this size, you give up intimacy for a sense of community. It's a different experience because of the friendships you make; even now, in the last week of the show, I'm still getting to know members of the cast. It's an opportunity to meet people and have fun because you form friendships everyday."

A production of this magnitude is certainly a feat, with the set, the lighting, sound, and video technology that create the environment of the play; it takes a dedicated group to pull it all together. Chast brings a new perspective to the theatre and her visions are realized not only through the designers and technicians, but through the actors as well.

A veteran of the theatre program here at Bucknell, Ian McNaughton, '01, who plays the melancholy and spying Jaques, said that working with a new director is "exciting, because you don't know what to expect. There's a level of mutual respect between the director and the actors that is somewhat different, because you're both experimenting, and the flexibility that comes with that is great to work with."

The love-antics, laughter, and role-reversals inherent in this classic play are not to be missed, as bonds of friendship are tested, cases of mistaken identity further confuse the plot and the many facets of love are revealed.

To purchase tickets individually, contact the Langone Center box office at 577-1700. Tickets are $5 for students and $4 for senior citizens.

"All the world's a stage," Jacques said. Come and support your fellow actors at the University this weekend!

As You Like It opens this weekend, starring Hillary DePiano '02, Lisa Britt '04 and Alex McCausland '02.

Restaurant Review The Victorian Lady

By Meghan Magge

The Victorian Lady restaurant, situated on the outskirts of Lewisburg, brings casual fine dining to the Lewisburg community. The Victorian Lady offers a unique cuisine with a focus on presentation and quality.

Dining at the Victorian Lady, for either lunch or dinner, promises to be an enjoyable experience for everyone.

Executive Chef, Phil Gadjia, prepares his culinary masterworks with fresh local ingredients and herbs picked from the Victorian Lady garden. The menu ideally suits varied tastes with delicious meat, poultry, fish, and vegetarian dishes. The desserts at the Victorian Lady only add to the restaurant's reputation.

The menu changes throughout the seasons, but the current one is always available at their website. I recently had the pleasure of lunching at the Victorian Lady. The restaurant serves soup, salad, entrees, and desserts during lunch. I olite mousse that was smuggled into a dark chocolate shell. Drizzled on top was a fabulous fresh strawberry glaze. The Victorian Lady features an enticing selection of desserts, which includes Peanut Butter Pie, Crème Brûlée, Apple Tart, and Chocolate Hazelnut Tart.

The dinner menu is a little more formal than the lunch one. Glancing over the dinner fare, the Citrus Veal Noisettes and the Grilled Swordfish with Mango and Black Bean caught my attention.

Vegetarians can enjoy a Victorian Lady dinner with the Mediterranean Vegetable Strudel, which is fresh spinach mixed with olives, lentils, feta cheese and artichokes wrapped in flaky phyllo dough served over tomato black olive tapenade.

In addition to a fabulous dining experience, the Victorian Lady offers catering services, High Tea on every third Wednesday of the month, and ice sculptures. The monthly High Tea fea-chose the Oxtail Soup, which is a flavorful soup with vegetables, egg noodles, beans, herbs and spices in a wonderful beef broth.

I did not try a salad, but the menu listed four fairly impressive salads, including a Tuscan Pasta salad.

The main courses for lunch range from innovative wraps and paninis to delicious sandwiches. I tried the Grilled Tenderloin Sandwich with blue cheese and fried leeks, which was fabulous: seasoned and grilled tenderloin, blue cheese, mayonnaise, and fried leeks on a toasted sesame roll. I don't think I could have made a better choice, however my lunch companion tried one of the daily specials, a turkey and swiss wrap.

I ambitiously managed to find room for dessert, and thankfully so. I tried a delicious white choc-colate entertainment, a three-course menu, and tea during the late afternoon.

The Victorian Lady opened for business less than four years ago by Dr. Don Byerly and his wife Mary, and their daughter, Mary, also the general manager. The restaurant serves lunch Monday through Friday and dinner Thursday through Saturday in six private dining rooms all decorated with Victorian décor. Two of the rooms have fireplaces and the restaurant uses a seasonal patio for dining during the warmer months. Just a short drive from the Bucknell community, the restaurant is one mile west of Route 15 on Route 45 and accepts reservations.

Mirth Grinder incorporates Graphic Design course

By Kacy O'Brien

Cutting-edge, innovative, collaborative. What do all of these adjectives have in common? They all describe Mirth Grinder Literary Magazine and the Graphic Design course, taught by Professor Constantine Timm, which designed Mirth Grinder's posters this semester.

You have probably seen some rather interesting posters around campus: a mermaid holding the Earth in her hands, meat grinders floating in a bright blue sky, a dark red poster with a miniature man in a large gas mask. All of these are the creations of students in a graphic design course this semester.

Among the students of Mirth Grinder Literary Magazine is Editor-in-Chief John Hanowell '02. Normally, the class does various projects and exercises, including poster design, though for the majority of the time the projects are seen only by the class and professor. John Hanowell suggested a project in which the students use this poster project to design posters for Mirth Grinder—with the added bonus of actual publication and display of their artwork, giving the campus the opportunity to see just what can be achieved by such collaboration, and the designers the chance to see their artwork all over campus.

The topic was introduced in a very simple manner; the students were told the title of the magazine and that it is a contemporary magazine. The introduction was limited so as to keep creativity freely flowing. The students were to come up with their own interpretation as to what Mirth Grinder meant and use basic informational requirements, such as deadline and where to send submissions.

The process used in the design course was described by Hanowell as a "progressive critique—everyone is receiving suggestions and comments from their fellow students as well as the professor, who proposes certain design techniques and compositional refinements." In an open-forum setting such as this, the inspirational and interpretive values of this class seem to exceed many, judging by the colorful, creative product of this collaboration. The innovative relationships formed in this class have broken the barriers between homework and a greater purpose.

"We are doing something that no one has done before; we're opening the gallery space at the University to encompass the entire campus and the entire student body," Hanowell said.

This "call for entries" is much more than the mundane colored-paper flyer, and not only because the posters are in color and the images eye-catching. It is the partnership between a student organization and the classroom, between a class project and a creative experience.

I seen through to completion and between nicely sectioned art and a gallery that spans every wall and bulletin board of this campus. Mirth Grinder and Professor Timm have set the bar at a new height through this cutting-edge, innovative and collaborative project.

"Remember the Titans" scores big

By Krista Reisdorf

"Remember the Titans" is a true story that takes place in Alexandria, Virginia in 1971. Herman Boone (Denzel Washington) comes to the town to assist Bill Yoast (Will Patton), the beloved head coach of the T.C. Williams High Titans.

Unbeknownst to both, Boone has been hired to be the new head coach, which causes an uproar in the town. Why? Because not only is he replacing the popular Yoast, but Herman Boone is black.

This is where the story begins, as T.C. Williams High School (which is all white) is forced to integrate with an all black school. In a town that reeks of racial prejudice, Coach Boone has to step up and rise above it all. His only hope for help and support is Yoast, who has been demoted to assistant coach. Against the rage of the townspeople, the two need to join forces to bring their now black and white team together.

Denzel Washington ("The Hurricane") is superb as always. As Boone he is a tough and demanding coach, putting every ounce of his energy into his love for the game and his players. His character is inspiring, and balances football life and real life nicely. He also masters the pep talk.

Will Patton ("Armageddon") is believable and real as Yoast. His southern charm and quiet manner compliment the outspoken Boone, making their relationship that much more interesting.

The relationship between football players Julius Campbell (Wood Harris) and Gerry Bertier (Ryan Hurst) is especially moving. The way that the black Julius and the white Gerry pull together and lead the team is, I'll admit, a bit of cliché. However, they really look like they're enjoying themselves while they do it, and seem like they have been best friends forever.

Some other amusing football players include Petej Jones (Donald Faison), Lewis Latik (Ethan Seple), and "The Rev" (Craig Kirkwood). Hayden Panettiere is a spunky addition to the cast, portraying Sheryl Yoast, the 9-year old football-crazed daughter of Bill Yoast. She even refers to her father as "Coach," and yells instructions to the team from the sidelines.

Remember the Titans' does a great job of dealing with the racial prejudice and the sudden integration of two races. Responses are realistic for the time period, and the gradual relationships between the characters are truly believable. Granted, Disney throws some schmaltz and cheesy moments in there, and much of the plot is predictable, but "Titans" delivers with a lot of charm and grace. The football clips are exciting and entertaining, the actors are refreshing, and the fact that it is based on a true story adds to its allure. "Remember the Titans" promises to captivate audiences and leave them cheering.

SCIENCE & TECHNOLOGY

Crack and keyboards: the new fad

By Monica Montgomery

Computers. They are everywhere. Dorm rooms, labs, banks, grocery stores and even farms. Almost every household in America now owns at least one computer. People are closer than ever through email and chat rooms. Anything you want, 24 hours a day.

So what could possibly be bad about this new technology?

The revolution of technology brought about by computers has increased the need for fast deals on the stock market, faster bandwidth on the Internet and even faster computer programs.

The need for computer scientists is at an all time high. Companies are constantly seeking more people who are willing to work long hours and produce efficient code. Most programmers work 60 hours a week and some close to 100 hours.

Coffee just isn't cutting it out in the real world.

"Drugs are the dirty little secret of the dot-com world," said Dr. Alex Stalcup, medical director of the New Leaf Treatment Center in Concord, Calif.

"It makes sense, really.

There's so much money, so long hours, such pressure to perform here. It's speed to work on, coke to play on and heroin to come down on."

Look back at the '80s. There were two large booms—Wall Street and cocaine. Fast pace living demanded an even faster paced par-

According to the Herald Tribune, the Narcotics Task Force of San Mateo County, Calif. has seen the amount of cocaine increase by 173 percent over the last four years while methamphetamine (otherwise known as meth or speed) has increased by 678 percent. Wise County, Calif. Sheriff's department has seen speed increase by 6000 percent. The Coast Guard announced they have seized "a record 125,904 pounds of cocaine over the last year."

Furthermore, doctors at the Silicon Valley have reported an exponential increase of technological workers who have been admitted into rehab clinics over the last two years, according to the Herald Tribune. A trauma center in Sacramento, Calif. has seen a large increase in methamphetamine found in admitted patients, according to webmd.com.

"I see programmers who start their day by stirring meth into their cup of coffee," said Rev. Katherine O'Connell, a clinical psychologist and interfaith minister in Capitola, Calif.

Despite the increasing correlation between cocaine use and computer programmers, most companies are still refusing to implement drug screening on their employees, according to the Herald Tribune.

"The pressure of abnormally high levels of drug use in the computer science community creates an unexpected and distracting element in an already pressure-filled environment," said Rick Hoskinson, a senior computer engineer.

"I can definitely see [a correlation between drugs and computer science]. If there is a project due, I'll definitely drink more Mountain Dew or something with a lot of caffeine to keep myself awake. And I'm sure when you are working at a job, caffeine won't cut it, and you need new ways to stay awake longer. But I don't think that I'll get into that next year," said Brandon Shaw '01.

So, for all computer scientists looking for a job or an internship, remember: stick with coffee. It's not worth it. If you want proof, ask anyone who was involved with Wall Street during the '80s.

Woman dies following a 20-hour flight

By Matt Albert

A Welsh woman died two weeks ago from a blood clot after traveling on a plane from Melbourne, Australia to London, England, according to CNN.

28-year-old bride-to-be Emma Christoffersen collapsed soon after debarking the 12,000 mile Qantas flight from a disorder being dubbed the "economy class syndrome."

The syndrome is caused by spending long hours in a cramped environment, similar to conditions found in economy class of an airplane.

The scientific name for this condition is called deep vein thrombosis (DVT). A silent killer, DVT sets in as blood begins to clot in a victim's leg. If there is continued immobility, the clot can move to the victim's heart, in which case sudden death is likely, reported Yahoo News.

Qantas Aviation Health Services Manager Ian Morrison said that the airline has recorded a small number of mild cases of DVT per every 17 million passengers, but have never previously encountered a death.

"It's not necessarily cramped environments; it's the immobility. Prolonged sitting, prolonged lying—that's the problem," said Morrison. British health officials report that seat size and dehydration are also factors in the syndrome.

Christoffersen complained of feeling unwell during the last leg of the 20-hour transcontinental flight. She collapsed in the arrival hall of Heathrow Airport in London and died before she could reach a hospital. The post-mortem examination confirmed that Christoffersen died from a blood clot near the heart.

"Math is hard." These three words were spoken by a talking version of Barbie introduced in the early 1990s. Denouncers argued that young girls would not even pretend to like math if their idol said it was too hard, resulting in such an uproar that Mattel had to recall the Barbie.

Barbie might as well have been talking about technology. A government report released in May 2000 documented that women continue to be relatively underpaid and underrepresented in the information technology (IT) workforce. According to the president's Council of Economic Advisors (CEA), women comprise 47 percent of the general workforce, but only hold 29 percent of IT jobs. To add to the disparity, men in high-tech careers are paid 22 percent more than are women.

Why is there such an occupational inequality? Are we talking about a pattern of malicious discrimination and exclusion or a system of unconscious biases and glass ceilings?

According to Charles Deraivics of Black Issues in Higher Education, obstacles range from discrimination and bias to pragmatic concerns like financial constraints and family responsibilities. Presently, discrimination seems to be more covert than blatantly obvious.

The roots of gender bias are built into a variety of work practices, cultural norms and images that at first glance appear unbiased. However, in practice these invisible patterns create a subtle wall of discrimination that block many women from entering or advancing in IT fields.

Kathleen de Melymuka, in the May 20 issue of Computeworld, compiled examples of these invisible biases against women. Many IT companies have an entrepreneurial culture. Employees make suggestions and conduct meetings on specific areas of interest. The majority of these meetings are held after hours, putting many women in a double bind.

"If women (because of family responsibilities) did not attend the meetings and protect their turf, they lost it. If they spoke up assertively, they were called control freaks," Melymuka said.

Of course, men acting in the same assertive manner are called passionate. One behavior, two labels.

According to Melymuka, every company has rhetoric about the importance of teamwork, but when asked what actions lead to advancement, behaviors revolving around being outstanding and self-promoting are proclaimed keys to success. Behaviors involved in making teams function smoothly are ignored and unrewarded.

The problem of gender discrimination has been identified and studied. Now, action needs to be taken. Plans need to be developed to ensure that "students from all backgrounds are prepared for careers in engineering, science, and technology." Texas Representative Eddie Bernice said, "The Commission for the Advancement of Women and Minorities in Science, Engineering and Technology Development cited specific ways the government could improve the situation.

Gore vs. Bush Environmental consciousness of presidential candidates revealed

By Kate Nowak

At the second presidential debate, Vice-President Al Gore was asked whether he currently upholds a statement he made in his 1992 book "Earthhood." "We must make the rescue of our environment the simple organizing principle for civilization and there must be a wrenching transformation to save the planet," Gore replied, "I still do."

On Oct. 21, USA Today reported Gore's criticism of his opponent, "George Bush has carried dirty water for special interests and can't be trusted to preserve the nation's environment if he is elected President."

Gore's evidence was Bush's environmental record in Texas. Since Bush took office in 1995, Texas has become the number one state for water pollution, air pollution and ground water pollution.

In addition, Houston has surpassed Los Angeles as having the most air pollution of any American city.

"Governor Bush has a horrible environmental record," Director of the Texas office of Public Citizen Tom Smith in the Dallas Morning News. "When he had a real chance to do something about air quality, he stood with the polluters, not the people."

Ken Kramer, with the Texas Sierra Club, an environmental group, said Mr. Bush "has not made the environment a priority."

Gore, once ridiculed as "Ozone Man" by former President George Bush, has been pushing for cleanup of the Hudson River, reduction of smoke-stack emissions from the Midwest, and restoration of Florida's Everglades.

During the debates, Gore explained that new kinds of cars and trucks—whose construction Detroit is currently pushing for—would reduce pollution. "We have to be bold, we have to provide leadership," Gore said.

When asked to choose between the economy and environment, Gore stated that the old argument that the environment and the economy are in conflict is really outdated.

"I will fight for a clean environment," Gore said, "in ways that will strengthen our economy." Being first on the market with new environmentally friendly technologies that would create millions of new jobs, such as the new kinds of cars and trucks, would benefit the economy.

Gore calls his environmental cleanup "the centerpiece of my career," meanwhile Bush has targeted Gore's energy taxes.

Gore's book calls for taxing in order to clean up the environment," Bush said. "But now that the energy prices are high, I guess he is not advocating those big energy taxes right now."

Bush promises that instead, he will push for collaborative efforts between states and local people. "People care a lot about their land and care about their environment. Not all wisdom is in Washington, D.C. on this issue," Bush said.

"Will we begin this new century with the same commitment to the environment that characterized America at the dawn of the present century?" Mr. Gore asked.

Leadership, according to Gore, is necessary.

In July, Gore sailed over the 410-mile Connecticut River, once called "a well-lanced sewer."

The river today is mostly cleaned up due to its designation by the Clinton administration as one of the 14 American Heritage Rivers needing special assistance. National guidance and support of local efforts was a fundamental step.

Towards the close of the debates, the issue of global warming exemplified further disparity between the environmental awareness of the two candidates.

"I think that the issue of global warming needs to be taken seriously," Bush said. "But I don't think we know the solution to global warming yet, and I don't think we've got all the facts before we make decisions."

Gore disagreed. "We do know the cause of global warming," he said. "It's pollution, carbon dioxide and other chemicals that are even more potent than the world's temperatures are going up, weather patterns are changing, storms are getting more violent and unpredictable. I want to be able to tell my grandson when I'm in my later years that I didn't turn away from the evidence that showed that we were doing some serious harm."

In defense, Bush's final remark on the topic was, "What the heck, I mean, look, global warming needs to be taken very seriously, and I take it seriously. But science—there's a lot of differing opinions and before we react I think it's best to have the full accounting, full understanding of what's taking place."

I suggest that candidate Bush subscribe to any leading science journal—or reread Vice President Gore's integrated work, "Earthhood."

For example, Pell grants could be increased for underrepresented students who choose to study science, engineering, or technology. Or, financial help could be given to colleges who support women, including institutional awards, research assistantships, traineeships, and expansion of proven programs.

Although there is a gender disparity in IT fields and advancements need to be made, there is some good news. Computeworld reported in its May 15 issue that women in full-time IT positions earn a median income of more than $38,000, which is 60 percent higher than the median income for women working outside IT, which is $23,900.

It is disappointing that gender-based discrimination still exists, especially in the rapidly expanding IT industry. Encouragingly, many positive strides are slowly being made in this continual struggle.

Never say never.

The men's soccer team would most likely give that statement unanimous support after the weekend they just came off of in South Carolina.

At the 2000 Gamecock Soccer Classic in Columbia, S.C., the Bison upset the no. 8 ranked University of South Carolina squad. The Bison surprised even themselves.

Going into the game we were preparing for the worst," Head Coach Brendan Nash said, "but we knew we had a chance."

omore Nick Taylor almost exactly a half hour after the South Carolina goal. Taylor maneuvered the ball around the Gamecock goalkeeper for Bucknell's first tally of the game.

Taylor's goal led the Bison into overtime periods against South Carolina in which they were able to claim a well-earned victory. Less than four minutes into the overtime period, senior captain Bill Epley headed the ball past the USC keeper to score the game-winning goal. Elliott Maruffi-Cowley '03 and Taylor were credited with the assists.

Before the game, Coach Nash had told the team that in order to win, two things needed to happen. First of all, they could not go straight at the Gamecocks, and second, everyone would have to play their best game.

"Fortunately, both things happened," Nash said. "Every Bucknell player played as well as he possibly could. Watching the ball go into the net I had feelings of disbelief and relief. The team deserved that game more than any other they have ever played in a Bucknell Uniform."

"It was a moment when the whole school would have been proud of the effort and accomplishment of the 25 players."

Although the Bison lost to the College of Charleston in the tournament championship on Sunday, 6-0, they did not go without proper recognition. Nick Taylor, a crucial element to Bucknell's success this weekend, was named the 2000 Gamecock Soccer Classic Offensive Most Valuable Player for scoring the game-tying goal and assisting on the game-winning goal against South Carolina.

Taylor, who leads the team in scoring, was also named the Patriot League Offensive Player of the Week for his efforts. Junior Greg Zenas and senior Bill Epley, who scored the game-winning goal in overtime, were also named to the all-tournament team. Both defenders helped to anchor a strong defense which held USC to only one goal.

"With each practice that passes and every game we play, the team's confidence in their abilities has grown. Our confidence is now the most dangerous aspect of our team." Senior Erick Davis said. "No one expected us to beat South Carolina except for us. If we continue to believe in ourselves and stay focused, our potential is unlimited."

With this ever-growing confidence, the Bison jumped back into Patriot League competition on Wednesday against Lafayette, in what would be a battle for first place in the Patriot League. Both offenses were stymied throughout regulation, and the game remained scoreless until the Leopards found the net in the game's 110th minute, giving them a 1-0 double-overtime victory.

Goalkeeper Steve Whitaker '04 grabbed six saves in the losing effort.

The loss dropped Bucknell to 8-8-2 overall and, more importantly, 3-1 in the Patriot League. This Bison has league foe Navy this Sunday at 4:00 p.m. A win clinches the Bison their first postseason appearance since 1993.

Athlete of the Week:
Bill Epley '01

By David Tomaino

Go ask your neighbor for a sweeper, and they will give you a Dirt Devil or a Hoover. Ask the men's soccer team, and they will give you senior Bill Epley.

Epley is the sweeper on the field, the last man left on defense protecting freshman goalie Steve Whitaker. These two have spent the year silencing opposing offenses, and have teamed up to cast a "steel curtain" on foes this season.

This year Epley's savvy leadership is showing up late in games. It hardly comes as a surprise to head coach Brendan Nash. "Bill is a superior athlete with a great attitude," Nash said. "And most importantly, he has a lot of character."

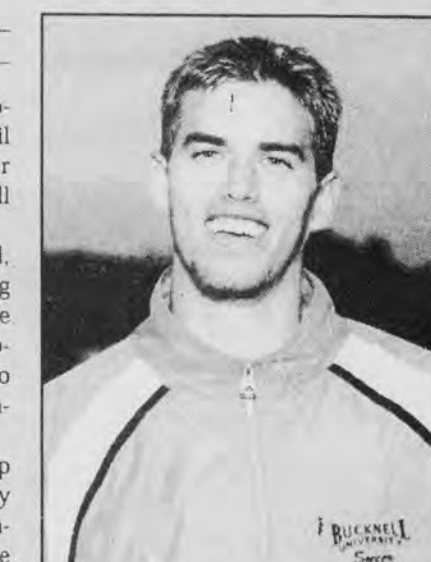

Epley used the most important body part in his performance this weekend, which gave the Bison an overtime win over South Carolina (2-1) after he headed in the game-winning goal.

The two-year captain is a multi-dimensional force on the soccer field, where he has tallied eleven career goals and ten assists. Opponents in preparation for the Bison have to be aware not only of his hulking presence defensively, but also his ability to create on offense.

"Offensively Bill has been very effective in our corner kick opportunities," Nash said.

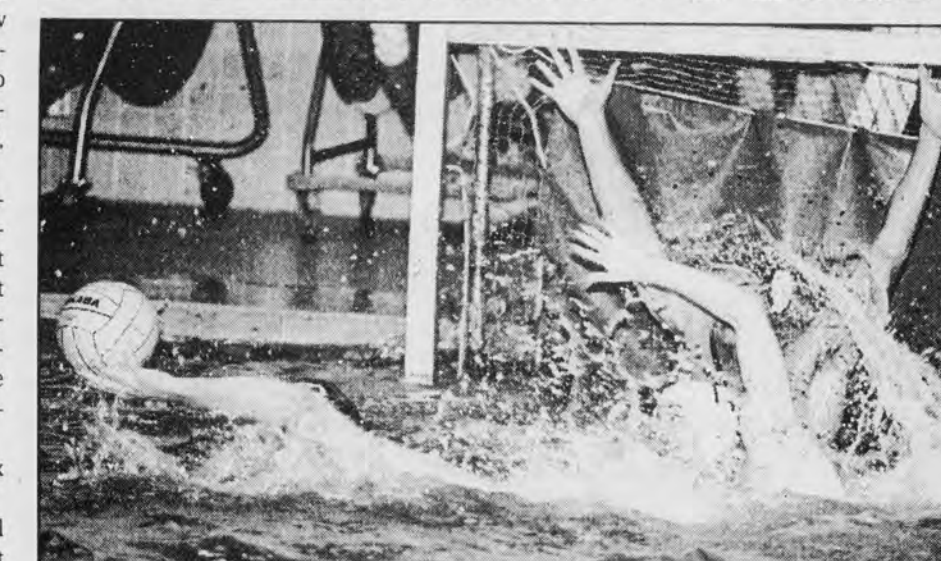

This skill was displayed in an earlier contest this month when Epley converted a corner kick into another game-winning goal in a victory over Philadelphia. Epley has already established himself among the elite in Bison soccer history, and last season he was named to the First Team All-Patriot League.

According to Coach Nash, the New Jersey native has one task left: to sweep up a Patriot League title for the team.

Bucknell's "relentless attack" returned in the second game against Slippery Rock, where a slow first quarter didn't put a hold on BU's scoring. The Orange and Blue came right back in the second and third, outscoring Slippery Rock 10-2.

Saettele let loose in the second half, firing in four goals and tallying an assist and a steal. Senior Tate Gredtizer and Permisohn each added two goals and three assists, while keeper David Kennedy '02 had an active game in the cage. The goalie had 11 saves as well as three assists and four steals.

Clearly a team effort, this 14-4 win was a boost of confidence for the Bison. "Our defensive pressure was the key to our victory here," Zeigler said. "And with multiple Bison players chipping in evenly with scoring, we were able to dominate on the offensive end."

The lack of first-quarter intensity ended abruptly with the third game of the weekend against Washington & Jefferson. Here the Bison came out hungry for goals and pumped in seven in the first quarter.

Sophomore Dan Lonerderle controlled the center of the offense from the hole and led the scoring with three goals. Adding two goals each were Saettele, Gredtizer, Ryan McCarty and sophomore Chris Saxton. Backup goalie Ryan Gens '04 had an outstanding game with 14 saves en route to the 14-7 victory.

Finally, the Bison played league newcomer Penn State Berks in what proved to be a lopsided contest. The 10-1 victory for the Orange and Blue was aided by freshman Scott Alzal's three goals and one

On an afternoon that recognized the contributions of three seniors playing in their final home Patriot League contest, the Bison fought to make sure the game would not be the last Patriot League match seniors Maura Higgs, Katie Yingling and Brett Russo would play. With a win over second place Fairfield, 3-2, the Bucknell field hockey team guaranteed itself an appearance in this year's Patriot League Tournament.

"The Fairfield game was huge for us," tri-captain Maura Higgs said. "We needed to win this game to have a shot at the [Patriot League] Tournament and we did. 'Nuff said."

The Bison jumped off to an immediate lead only a minute and a half into the game when junior Dena Ebert scored her eighth goal of the season off a pass from Higgs. Junior forward Melissa Maher did more damage as she tallied two more goals only ten minutes later. Maher single-handedly beat Fairfield goalkeeper Lauren Thomas, then got help off a pass from sophomore Amy Marvel to increase the lead to 3-0.

"We knew we had to be really excited about the game because of its importance," stressed tri-captain Brett Russo. "We were extremely fired up and opened the game strong. Everything else just fell into place."

The Stags were able to stick their foot in the door before the close of the first half when sophomore Kim Reddy scored with 16:37 remaining. The stingy Bison defense, led by tri-captain Katie Yingling and juniors Monica McCarty, Meghan Hopping and Lauren Campbell, fought off countless Fairfield penalty corners to send the game to halftime, 3-1.

In the second stanza, Fairfield was able to get a quick strike when sophomore Dani Brown scored her tenth of the season. Fortunately for the Bison, this would be the last goal from Fairfield, giving the Bison a 3-2 victory and an invite to the Patriot League Tournament as either the third or fourth seed (yet to be determined).

Brett Russo '01 skirts past a defender to advance the ball.

The Bison's two remaining games are against non-Patriot League opponents Cornell and Georgetown. Both games will be played on turf as opposed to Bucknell's grass field.

"Although these games are non-League, they will give us the opportunity to practice playing on turf," Yingling said. "In the tournament, we'll have to play on turf against teams who play on that type of surface all season."

The Bison traveled to Ithaca, N.Y. on Tuesday to challenge Cornell and fell, 2-1. Ebert got the Bison on the board late in the first half, but the Big Red responded quickly with two goals in a two minute span to secure the victory.

The Bison will close their regular season with a road game against Georgetown this Saturday.

Steve Whitaker '04: The ball stops here

By Brian Klotz

The Bucknell University men's soccer team was in desperate need of a standout goalie. And they found that in freshman Steve Whitaker.

"We were very uncertain in the preseason," said head men's soccer coach Brendan Nash in reference to his goalkeeper situation. "In fact, uncertain might not even describe it."

For Nash, the graduation of a senior goalie with no one to replace him made the summer full of worries.

"We had six freshman goalies in preseason camp, but we only kept three," Nash said. "We didn't know who would start."

With the passage of the first couple weeks, coach Nash threw Whitaker into the goal for a game to see what would happen. When Whitaker turned out an impressive eight-save shutout in that game against St. Francis, he surprised everyone and won himself a starting spot.

Whitaker was born in France and moved to Italy when he was five years old. When he was six, Whitaker enjoyed playing soccer with his friends because there was no organized league. When his town finally organized a soccer club, he took the position of goalie from the first day.

He came to the United States when he was twelve years old and his family settled into the town of Berwin, Pa., near Philadelphia. When he began attending Conestoga high school, Steve played varsity tennis for three years and JV basketball for one, but focused most of his energy on honing his soccer skills.

Freshman keeper Steve Whitaker has been strong in the net for the Bison, and is ranked in the nations top five in both save percentage and goals against average.

In his junior and senior year,

Whitaker racked up such soccer honors as second and first team All-League, All-Area Standout and fourth runner-up for league MVP. When he began searching for a college, Whitaker knew he wanted to play soccer, but foremost was seeking a solid education.

"I looked at colleges first of all for academics," Whitaker said, "but I wanted to continue playing soccer. I got offers to go to school for free, but they didn't have good academics. Coach Nash really showed dedication to the soccer program with that same attitude of academics first."

Arriving here for preseason practices, Whitaker didn't know what to expect. "I didn't know about the goalie situation," he remembered. "Once I got here, I found out it was up for grabs. I knew that I had to play the way that I know how to play to get it."

Whitaker didn't know where he was placed in the goal, he stayed there. "He's a gamer," Nash said. "In practice, all three goalies are about the same, but he is very confident on the field and doesn't play like a freshman."

"I knew it was up to one of the freshman to jump into the situation," Whitaker said. "I wanted to be a major part of the team from the beginning; I wanted to be a determining factor."

Whitaker has had to make a number of adjustments to collegiate play in division one. "It's a big switch from being a senior on a team of underclassmen in high school to playing as a freshman on a team of upperclassmen in college," Whitaker said, "but I also need to get used to the speed of the game."

On the field, Whitaker attributes much of his success to the strength of his defense. "The unity of the whole defense is a major reason for my success," Whitaker said. "They surprise themselves with what they can do. Senior Bill Epley helps to unite us all."

On the field, his teammates notice Whitaker's command of the defense. Teammate and fellow freshman Brian King said of Whitaker, "We always hear him back there, and he sometimes says things when there is really nothing to say. He's really stepped up and keeps us organized. I like playing with him back there."

Whitaker's play has already turned some heads. In recent press releases, he was ranked in the top four in the country in terms of save percentage (37 saves in his first five games), top five for goals against average (he allowed only two goals in 489 minutes of play for a 0.37 average) and was named Patriot League Defensive Player of the Week for the week of Sept. 18-25.

For Whitaker, nothing matches the exhilarating feeling of that big success. "My most memorable game would have to be when we beat South Carolina," Whitaker said. "It was a perfect field, their home crowd and we beat them 2-1 in overtime. We stunned them."

Currently, Whitaker is a business major here at Bucknell. He feels that balancing academics and athletics is very important. "I feel that I do better when I play sports because I have to manage my time," Whitaker said. "Playing sports helps me get more organized."

Bison Honor Roll

Three Bucknell University football players were honored Tuesday afternoon at the Lewisburg Touchdown Club Luncheon. Running back LaMario Bradwell '01 was tabbed as the Offensive Player of the Game after rushing for 50 yards on 17 carries and catching a pass for 21 yards against Lehigh. Nose guard Adam Lord '03 was named the Defensive Player of the Game. Lord finished the day with three tackles, all of which were unassisted, and nearly intercepted a Lehigh pass after batting it in the air. Mike Leatherman '04 was chosen as the Special Teams Player of the Game. Leatherman, who has made a habit of being the first cover man down the field on special teams, forced a Lehigh fumble on a punt deep in Mountain Hawk territory, resulting in a touchdown for Bucknell.

Soccer forward Nick Taylor '03 has been named the Patriot League Offensive Player of the Week for the week of Oct. 16-22. Taylor was a crucial element in Bucknell's weekend, scoring the game-tying goal and assisting on the game-winning goal in a 2-1 overtime victory against the eighth ranked team in the country, South Carolina. He was named the 2000 Gamecock Soccer Classic Offensive Most Valuable Player for his efforts on the weekend. The honor was his second all-tournament team selection of the 2000 campaign. He was also named to the Smith Barney Soccer Classic team in September.

Field hockey forward Melissa Maher '02 has been named the Patriot League Offensive Player of the Week for field hockey for the week. It is Maher's second Offensive Player of the Week honor of the season. Maher was vital in Bucknell's victory this past week against Patriot League rival Fairfield. The forward scored the final two goals for Bucknell in a crucial 3-2 win against the Stags on Saturday.

Freshman tailback Jess Brinson was selected as the Patriot League's Rookie of the Week for the week ending Sunday, Oct. 22, 2000. Pressed into extensive action with the injury of teammate Jabu Powell (nation's 10th leading rusher), Brinson responded with 98 yards of total offense in Bucknell's 21-14 setback at nationally-ranked Lehigh.

At the 2000 Gamecock Soccer Classic, senior Bill Epley and junior Greg Stunzenas were named to the All-Tournament Team. Epley picks up his second all-tournament team honor of the season, after helping to hold the South Carolina offense to just one goal. In addition, he scored the game-winning just over three minutes into overtime against the Gamecocks. Stunzenas is a key defender for the Bison. After missing most of the 1999 season with a knee injury, Stunzenas has come back to start all 17 games for the Orange and Blue this season.

NCAA sees unusual trends

Old powerhouses and unknowns vie for national spotlight

By Rob Schmicker

Division I-A college football has been wild and unpredictable this year. While the dominant teams of the past decade—Florida State, Florida and Nebraska—are still in the Top Ten, neither Florida State nor Florida is at the top of the polls, having already been beaten this year.

As for Nebraska, they survived an early scare against Notre Dame, but still have a few roadblocks on their way to an undefeated season. While the top teams of the nineties are slowly losing their grip, a few powerhouse teams of the 1970s and 80s are making their return to the limelight. Also, several schools are finally getting the taste of sweet success.

During the past decade, powerhouse schools like Oklahoma, Miami (FL), and Notre Dame have had, by their standards, below average years. But currently, the Sooners, Hurricanes, and Fighting Irish are ranked third, fourth, fifth, and nineteenth respectively. While in the ACC, Coach Tommy Bowden has a resurgent Clemson team ranked fifth and looking down the road to Nov. 4, when they will face Tommy's father Bobby and defending champs, Florida State.

In the Pac-10, UCLA and USC are no longer at the top; instead, Oregon and Oregon State are a combined 12-2 and looking to break into the upper tier of college football. Some other surprise teams are TCU, who is undefeated at 7-0, Northwestern, and of course seventeenth-ranked South Carolina, who is 6-1 this year after going winless all of last year.

While all these teams are looking good now, everything can change, and is likely to change given the wacky turn of events already this year. And in college football, one loss can take you from contender to instant pretender.

With that in mind, this weekend's game between No. 3 Oklahoma and No. 1 Nebraska not only has title implications, but will determine whether the Sooners are for real or not.

During the 1970s, Oklahoma and Nebraska combined for a total of four national titles, all ten Big Eight conference titles, and two Heisman Trophy winners. Their annual game always determined the conference winner and in most years had title implications.

But since 1994, Nebraska has won three titles while Oklahoma has struggled; the Sooners recorded a .435 winning percentage, including a school worst 3-8 record in 1996.

This year has been different for Oklahoma, though. Led by second-year coach Bob Stoops, OU has already blown out then No. 11 Texas, 63-14, and two weeks ago they no. 2 Kansas State 41-31. Now they set their sights on Nebraska, hoping to erase doubts from all those who still think they're a fluke. In my mind, this game could be the best of the year—a must watch.

While most of the nation will be focusing on the Nebraska game this weekend, Miami knows that an equally important game lies down the road, only two weeks away. On the same weekend as Clemson-FSU, Virginia Tech will travel to Miami to take on the Hurricanes in a game that will also have major title implications, which is a far stretch from where the program was just a few years ago.

Arguably, Miami may have been the top team of the 1980s, as they won three national titles, but recently they have suffered through losing records and NCAA sanctions.

Much of the credit can be placed on coach Butch Davis, who re-energized the team after sanctions created a black cloud over the program. After a few tough years to start with, Davis has a team that is ready to compete for the title. Three weeks ago, Miami knocked off then second-ranked Florida State, and will play four of their final five games at home. If not for an early season loss to ninth-ranked Washington, these Games could be ranked first.

Like Miami, Notre Dame is on the rise once again, led by coach Bob Davie, who had the difficult job of replacing Lou Holtz after he left in 1996. His first few years were very forgettable, and almost everyone in South Bend was calling for his head. But the school stuck with him, and a nine-win season is very possible. And this comes after losing QB Jarvis Jackson to the NFL, and replacement Amaz Battle to injury. The Fighting Irish still play one of the toughest schedules in America and are a few unlucky plays from being 7-0.

While Notre Dame, Oklahoma, and Miami have all come back from near extinction, classic powerhouses Alabama, Tennessee, USC and Penn State have all had years they'd like to forget about. The four are a combined 12-16 (6-11 in their respective conferences), and all are in jeopardy of missing the bowls. Time will only tell if this is the beginning of the mediocrity for these schools, or simply a rebuilding year.

The other big story of the year has been the resurgence of the Pac-10. Last year it was the weakest of the five big conferences, and ended with only one team in the Top 25. This year has been different though, as six teams have been a part of the Top 25 at one time, with two currently in the Top Ten. While neither Oregon nor Washington may play for the national title, it is possible that this year's Rose Bowl will actually be a match-up of top ten teams "for the first time in two years."

As can be seen, there are some startling trends in college football this year. New teams are challenging the leaders, and you never know when an upset is going to occur. But, is this parity good for the sport? It's good to see the tradition powerhouses at the top of the polls, but sometimes it gets old seeing Nebraska or Florida State play in the national title game every year.

Most people would rather watch a rivalry game like Nebraska-Oklahoma, or one in which an unknown is able to knock off a top-ranked team. That's what college football is all about, and this is the year to enjoy it.

Offseason moves reshape NBA

By Aaron DeRosa

While the boys of summer were swinging for the fences in ballparks across America, executives sat at conference tables, laboriously planning and scheming for the upcoming NBA season.

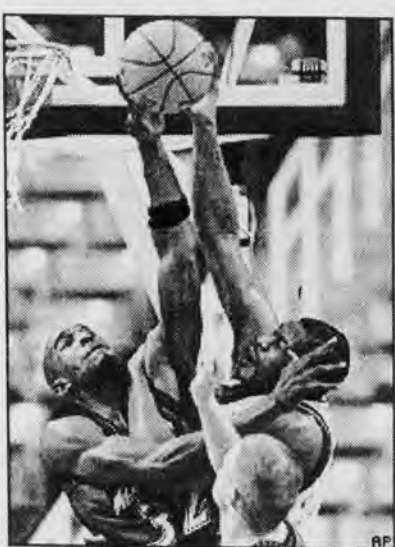

After wading through draft picks, scouting reports, trade proposals and salary cap conflicts, many teams have remodeled themselves in an attempt to be competitive. Some have succeeded, some have failed. Now, with only a week away from the first regular season tip-off, questions arise as to who will lead the pack, and who will be left by the wayside.

In the Western Conference, the Los Angeles Lakers and the Portland Trailblazers sit atop a veritable Mount Olympus among all other teams in the league. Few can match them in depth or talent. Even the loss of amazing athletes such as Glen Rice, Detlef Schrempf, and Arvydas Sabonis to trade and injury can't dethrone these seeming modern-day titans.

So what contemporary team will be able to challenge these west coast juggernauts? Well, cheesy catch phrases and obscure ancient mythological references aside, there are a number of teams that wait patiently in the wings.

One such team is the San Antonio Spurs. With Tim Duncan healthy again, there is no limit to what this team can do. Side by side with David Robinson in the frontcourt, backed by the newly signed slasher Derek Anderson and veteran swingman Avery Johnson in the backcourt, the Spurs may be able to compete with the higher echelon teams. The main concern for San Antonio is injuries. Tim Duncan's knee doesn't look to be a chronic concern. David Robinson is still battling back problems and Sean Elliott has yet to revert back to form after kidney replacement surgery last year.

As long as their stars remain healthy, the Spurs will be competitive in the West. And if Duncan plays 82 games, look for a close MVP vote this year.

healthy, the Spurs will be competitive in the West. And if Duncan plays 82 games, look for a close MVP vote this year.

Another team that looks promising is the Dallas Mavericks. Scoring has never been a problem for the Mavs, who were outscored by only two other teams in the league last year. Rather, the question mark has always been their defensive and rebounding capabilities, which explain their failed experiment in signing Dennis Rodman last season.

They lack an effective center, relying solely on Shawn Bradley, who would just as soon be found fishing in his basement than guarding a man in the post. Trading Cedric Ceballos for Christian Laettner may help, depending on whether or not Laettner will be able to revert back to his 18 points, nine rebounds-a-game from four years ago.

But the man they will look to, in large part, is rookie Evan Thomas, an amazing shot blocker and a more than adequate defender. Dallas hopes he'll be able to match up with the bigger men in the league. And although they may have difficulties with the stronger front courts like Portland and LA, they are definitely playoff-bound.

The Eastern Conference lacks a true dominant team like those in the west. But the east has not had such a team since Michael Jordan's Bulls. There are contenders and there are heavy hitters, but no real "team-to-beat," although Florida was looking for their two franchises to compete for that title.

Both the Miami Heat and the Orlando Magic were extremely busy over the offseason, acquiring talent such as Eddie Jones, Tracy McGrady and Grant Hill to name a few. Unfortunately, doubt still lingers as to their beneficial impact.

Orlando's acquisition of Grant Hill and Tracy McGrady spurs a number of question marks. With Hill's need to establish himself after rebounding from ankle surgery, McGrady's attempts to prove his worth and boost his numbers, and Darrell Armstrong who has led the backcourt in Orlando for so long, will they ever be able to form a cohesive team?

It seems unlikely that three high-talent players will be able to start the ball for the betterment of the team, but that remains to be seen. So after the pursuit and attainment of two top-echelon scoring threats, they find themselves with the same problem as the Mavericks: too many scorers, not enough boards.

Their frontcourt is weak and they lack the depth of their western rivals. The same goes for Miami as they deal with the loss of Alonzo Mourning to a kidney ailment. Last year, Miami was a star shooting guard away from a championship appearance. They picked up Eddie Jones to fill that role, but the unfortunate loss of Mourning knocks the wind out of their playoff bound sails.

Bweep not for their loss because the season is not over. Signing Brian Grant eases their frontcourt woes, but they need him to take on a lot of responsibilities. Despite all this, with the weakness and inconsistency of the east, making the playoffs will be easier than 1-2-3.

NFL Experts' Picks

By Justin McCarthy and Ali Ahmed

NY Jets (6-1) at Buffalo Bills (3-4)

The Jets are coming off an emotional win over Miami to claim first place in the AFC East, while the Bills have not beaten a divisional foe all season. The Jets have been unbelievable with Testaverde leading them (in their one loss, he was knocked out of the game on the very first offensive play). Then they have Curtis Martin, one of the top running backs in the league who is set on pace to easily surpass 1,000 rushing yards this season, as he has in every season of his career. Martin will be put to the test this week against a tough Buffalo run-stopping defense that is allowing an average of only 76.1 yards a game. The Bills hope that Flutie can turn around their fortunes, as their current slide started with a Week three loss at the hands of the Jets. Buffalo will need to contain Martin and cannot allow Testaverde to get into a rhythm like he did in the second half against Miami last weekend. These Jets will stop over the Bills and herd the wild Buffalo.

Justin's pick: NY Jets 34-17

The Jets must be feeling pretty good about themselves right now. Nobody would have thought that they would be in this position, especially with Al Groh and his aggressive style leading the way. They seem to find a way each game to score points, even though they grind out the yards with Martin. Everyone thinks the Jets have a great defense and they have the makings of a great team, but they have allowed many teams to move the ball on them, including Jay Fiedler and the Dolphins. The Bills played really well last game and almost upset the Vikings, and I feel that they might do better this game. Even though I don't think Flutie is a great starter, he can provide a spark. The Jets will be forced to throw the ball since you can't run on the Bills, especially up the middle. And they can't count on amazing comebacks, like they did against Miami, every week. The Bills defense might be able to give the Jets a lot of trouble since they run the same zone blitz defense that the Steelers used to give them so much trouble.

Ali's pick: Bills 20-16

Detroit (5-2) at Indianapolis (5-2)

Detroit is a ball control offensive team with a solid defense to back them up, while Indianapolis is a high scoring machine that relies totally on offense to win games. Detroit leads the league in interceptions and tops the NFL in turnovers forced. However, the Colts have not fumbled the ball all season, and as long as Manning doesn't force the ball, Detroit's defense should not be able to create turnovers. The Colts are second in the league in passing offense, as they average 302.0 yards a game. The key for a Lions victory is their defense—their secondary needs to shut down Manning and their linemen need to control the line and keep pressure on Manning and James coming out of the backfield. To win, the Colts will need to pressure Batch and force him to make mistakes, which may be done easily done considering the Lions offensive line is allowing Batch to be sacked almost four times a game. The Colts, if they can control the offensive line, will pull Dilger off and have him run runs, which will free up room for Harrison and the other Colt receivers downfield. The Colts will outrun and avoid the bite of these hungry Lions.

Justin's pick: Colts 31-20

I think fans of Indianapolis are just starting to figure out that without a defense, the Colts are not going to make any noise in the playoffs. (Hint Rams fans). Things also just got worse with the loss of Rob Morris, which should really hurt the Colts' run defense. Still, with Harrison, Manning and James the Colts will be a very entertaining team to watch. But they will be challenged against the Lions' defense. It will be interesting to see how James and an improving offensive line work against the Lions' front seven. That might determine if the Colts can outscore the Lions or not. The Lions, on the other hand, are having a really good season, and they should get better as the season goes on and Batch matures. Also, as their wide receivers get healthier, they will be very dangerous, as James Stewart is starting to run like the big-game back that the Lions paid him to be. I think that the Lions are still a few games and adjustments away from being at the top of their game.

Ali's pick: Colts 36-31

Minnesota (7-0) at Tampa Bay (3-4)

Tampa Bay has lost four straight, however, three of those four losses were by a TD or less. Also, the Vikings, even though they are undefeated, have not won a game convincingly, their average margin of victory is only 6.7 points and they have won only one game by more than one score. The Bucs have lost merely because of their lack of offense; however, they still possess one of the top defensive units in the league. Tampa leads the league in sacks and is second in passing defense (166.0). The key for a Bucs victory is to create an offensive presence, as they need more than Dunn and Alstott running the ball. Also, their defense will surely be tested against a strong Minnesota passing and rushing attack. The Vikings led the league in rushing offense (149.4) and with receivers like Moss and Carter, Minnesota could run away with this one.

Justin's pick: Vikings 38-20

Minnesota got real lucky last week and managed to pull out a win, but I think Cupepper still has to prove himself and not rely on Carter and Moss. Everybody thinks he is doing great, but I think it is a product of the system. The Bucs defense might make him prove how ready he really is. Moss is once again playing great despite everyone targeting him and he should be able to handle the Bucs' corners real easily. Still the Vikings must try and make the Bucs unbalanced and run the ball as much as possible while also making sure they use Carter and their tight ends more. The Bucs, on the other hand, might be ready to implode if they don't pull this out this win. Their defense is still dominant but their offense keeps putting them in holes. The Bucs either need to go back to their boring run control offense or let offensive coordinator Steckel open up the offense and run it like he wants. If (and that's a big if) Shaun King is really as good as the Bucs think, then Steckel should be able to make the Bucs at least an average effort.

Ali's pick: Bucs 29-27

Pittsburgh (4-3) at Baltimore (5-3)

Both teams do not have a steady QB—Stewart will start for Pittsburgh and Dilfer will take over the Ravens' offense from Rappin. The Steelers have allowed a total of only three points in their last three games, while the Ravens defense tops the NFL in run defense and turnover ratio. This game will be decided by which team's defense steps up and makes the bigger plays. When the Steelers got shutout by the Ravens on opening day, their offense was in shambles and their defense had not settled in. Currently though, the Steelers running attack is virtually unstoppable while they ride the Bucs, and the passing game has steadily begun to show potential. As a result, they are riding a four-game winning streak into Baltimore. The Ravens on the other hand, have not scored a touchdown in four straight weeks and have lost their past two games. The Steelers iron is hot and they will burn the feathers off these grounded Ravens.

Justin's pick: Steelers 23-6

Now that Kordell is back at starter, Pittsburgh's offense should start playing better. Yes everyone, I am a Kordell believer and I think being the backup has helped him. One thing I especially like about Kordell is that he is looking for more wide receivers on pass plays instead of looking primarily to Hines Ward as Graham did. I love Ward but I think Pittsburgh has a very deep receiving corps that should be used. Pittsburgh's running game will be very questionable this week with the lack of a blocking back, but the Steelers should be fine with the two tight end set. Also, I think the Steelers need to throw the ball to win this game, but given the Ravens' offense, they won't need to score much to win this game. The Ravens are in a terrible situation offensively even though they added a ton of offensive talent in the off-season. I know Banks has struggled, but Trent Dilfer? I can safely say the the Steelers' defense is going to make the Ravens feel pretty stupid about choosing Dilfer to start.

Ali's pick: Steelers 17-6

Tennessee (6-1) at Washington (6-2)

The Titans have won six straight games after losing their opener. Their pass defense (172.0) is top in the AFC, and they have allowed just one touchdown in the past 10 quarters of play. The Redskins are also riding a string of victories, having won their past five; and in those five games they have held their opponents to an average of only 11.2 points. The Titans possess a talented and quick pass rush, therefore the Redskins' offensive line will need to establish itself early and give Brad Johnson time to allow the Redskins to get into an offensive rhythm that has been dominating recently. Both teams are strong on the run, both offensively and defensively; therefore this game will be decided by the effectiveness of each team's passing attacks. Tennessee will have to rely on McNair and a passing attack more than usual, because as of now Eddie George is listed day-to-day and even if he plays he will probably not be at 100 percent. These Redskins will scalp and bring down the mighty Titans.

Justin's pick: Redskins 23-20

I really don't know how Tennessee is still able to win games, but I really don't think they will keep it up. Eddie George can't keep carrying them like he does. The defense is playing well, but they will face a real test this week against the Redskins, who are also in the same position relying on Davis to carry them while trying to put together a passing attack. Still, they seem to be getting better and better offensively, and I think they should actually manhandle the Titans this week. The Skins' defense is really coming together with Bruce Smith leading the way. Their defensive should control the line of scrimmage and hold Eddie George. I don't think that McNair can then lead the Titans to victory despite what their record shows.

Ali's pick: Redskins 33-17

Swim and dive squads display early prowess

By Carmen Mauriello

"Nobody remembers how fast you swim in October." This favorite saying of Bucknell swimming and diving head coach Jerry Foley typifies the approach that the 2000-01 Bison men's and women's teams are taking for their long, grueling season that runs from October to February. The fact that the Bison aim to peak for the Patriot League Championships should strike fear into other league opponents, because both experienced and deep squads opened their season by dominating Bloomsburg Tuesday, and they've got four months to get even better.

The men's squad is led by senior tri-captains John Ferriter, Justin Schwarz and Jeff Sharpe, who hold two individual top-ten performances and seven relay top-ten performances in the Bucknell record books collectively amongst themselves.

"The men's captains are leading by doing everything being asked of them," Foley said. "The team looks up to them and wants to emulate what they do."

The team's other four seniors are also counted on to play major roles. Benjamin Lim holds the Bucknell record in the 200-yard freestyle and the third best time in the 100-yard breaststroke, while Bill Orendorf and Bill Trabosh are expected to be consistent finishers in the individual medley and distance freestyle events. Ehan Lew is the only senior diver, and he will lead the Bison diving squad.

The sole junior swimmer for the men's team is Chris Neary, who was an all-league selection last season after recording twenty-first place finishes at the Patriot League Championships. Neary owns two individual top-ten performances and eight relay top-ten performances in the Bucknell record books, as well as several all-league team honors.

Sophomores Adam Fackler, Gonzalo Diaz and Adam Yerkes are expected to be steady contributors for the team, as well as classmate Michael Guskey, who holds the school's all-time top performance in the 100-yard breaststroke.

The women's team will be bolstered by the addition of six talented freshmen, who Foley expects to challenge the upperclassmen for positions on the team.

"Our biggest goal is to score more points at Patriots than we have in the past and to compete as well as we can against our biggest competitors, Army and Lehigh," Ferriter said.

The women's team is also led by a trio of senior captains - Molly Love, Melanie Kasper and Gwen Packard. Lowe holds the school record in the 400-yard individual medley, and she also has set her sights on taking over the top spot for the 200-yard individual medley. Kasper has been a consistent performer for the Bison in the butterfly events, while Packard has excelled in the freestyle and

"Each of the seven years I've been in the Patriot League, it keeps getting better and better... Our program has improved tremendously, but only time will tell if we've caught the teams in front of us."
—Coach Jerry Foley

backstroke events.

"The women's captains provide great team spirit," Foley said. "They keep the team real positive, spirited and unified."

Bucknell's other two seniors, Patrice Cahill and Megan Jones, will also be looked to for contributions.

As with the men's team, the junior class of the women's team has a lack of numbers but great potential. Its members, Barbara Morgan and Abby Weaver, will focus their strengths on the freestyle and breaststroke events. Weaver was part of the 400-yard medley team that captured first place at last year's Patriot League Championships.

The sophomore class is led by Darby Golino, Becky Dolan and Lauren Mosler, who all recorded top-ten finishes in only their first season on the team. Golino was named to the All-League team last season after she recorded two second place individual finishes and was on the winning 400-yard medley relay team at the Patriot League Championships.

The class of 2004 includes eight swimmers and Bucknell's only female diver, Sarah Petcavage; the newcomers are expected to become consistent contributors for the Bison this season.

"We graduated some fast seniors last year," Weaver said, "but we have a good freshman class that has been able to make up for their loss."

Foley believes that the biggest strength of both teams is their depth. "This is our deepest team in two years," Foley said. "We can put two people up of equal ability in almost every event."

The Bison men's team was picked to finish third in the Patriot League this season behind perennial powers Army and Lehigh, while the women's team was voted fourth in the league behind Lehigh, Army and Navy.

Each of the seven years I've been in the Patriot League, it keeps getting better and better. This year is the best competition since its inception," Foley said. "Our program has improved tremendously, but only time will tell if we've caught the teams in front of us."

The Orange and Blue posted an impressive start to their season on Tuesday, as both the men's and women's teams defeated Bloomsburg by the identical score of 170-89.

The men captured 11 of 14 events, led by double-winners Neary and Diaz. The women won all 12 events, led by double-winners Lowe, Weaver and Meghan Freese '04.

"It was a great first meet that got a lot of the bugs out. It really prepares us for our next couple meets," Foley said. "Based on our performance, we're way ahead of where we were last year at this point."

The Bison need to maintain their top form, as they will be challenged by league runner-up Army this Saturday at 11:00 a.m. in Fries-Rooke pool. Foley said that Army has a "target on its back" for his team, and the Bison hope a frenzied Homecoming crowd can help them capture this huge league win.

Come from behind victory allows the "All Blacks" to advance into the second round of the playoffs

By Pete Tulaney

The men's rugby game on Sunday, Oct. 14 will be a game to go down in Bucknell rugby history. The undefeated "All Blacks" took the field against the Coyotes of Bloomsburg to defend their undefeated title with hopes to further advance into the playoffs.

Iggy Tai-An '04 echoed these words before the game: "I think we can do it." After two intense and physical halves, Tai-An's prediction proved psychic, as the "All Blacks" emerged victorious and advanced into the second round of the playoffs.

The "All Blacks" suffered a rough first half, giving up 15 unanswered points to a victory-hungry Bloomsburg squad. The half was an intense and emotional one, as multiple players were ejected from the game for fighting. One Bloomsburg player was instructed to sit in his car for the remainder of the game for arguing a referee's call.

The second half was a huge turnaround for the Bucknell rugby team. Down 15 points, the "All Blacks" knew they had to get a big play, and we definitely knew who could do it," said senior co-captain Piers Cautsons, referring to his 6'3" 220 lb. prop Pete Tulaney '02. "We give him the ball, and he makes things happen."

Pinned deep in its own territory, the team needed a big play. After a bone-crushing hit delivered by Brian Berkley '01 and Mike Naparano '01, Bucknell regained possession of the ball. After a few quick passes, the ball found its way into the hands of Tulaney. Shaking defenders left and right, Tulaney rumbled down the field for a 75-meter gain. "Simply amazing," Tai-An said of the run.

This set Bucknell up for its first score of the game—a run started by Joe Free '04 and touched down by Dan Kelly '04. "These two freshmen have been a big-time addition to the team," Berkley said.

The rest of the second half was highlighted by big defensive hits by Keon Burley '02, Greg Manz '01 and Zach Davis '02 that all but shut down the Bloomsburg offense.

Hard running by sophomores Jeff Glaeser and Colin Swank kept the ball in Bloomsburg territory.

Scott Roe '03 hooked an excellent game even after being ejected for 10 minutes because of a fight. Matt Summers '02, Roe's replacement, provided a fresh pair of legs when we needed it most.

Luke Bailey '03, the "All Black Fly," played an outstanding game as well. The team played a scare when Bailey's face was stepped on in the second half, but he was a trooper and remained in the game.

A second score came by way of a perfectly placed kick by Bram Nel '02, and an instinctual dive for the try zone by Naparano. "He seemed to know the ball was going to be there," Tai-An said.

The game culminated on a 15-meter run by the Burley. "He ran with a fierce intensity," Tai-An said.

Next week the "All Blacks" take on Villanova for the 1st place on the MARFU tournament this spring.

#1 Nebraska @ #3 Oklahoma

This is a game from our parents' generation. Three yards on a cloud of dust was the name of the game back then, now it is one of the Spurrier offense and the five receiver set. It is nice to see it once again has national championship implications.

In the past three meetings Nebraska has outscored the Sooners 179-28, and has won seven straight games against its Big 12 rival. This year's Oklahoma team is a bit different though, and exploded onto the national championship scene with its 63-14 dismantling of Texas. The Sooners further secured that spot the next week when they handed K-State their first loss of the year in Manhattan.

Nebraska has been solid this season as always, but they are not the Nebraska team of the Tommie Frazier era. Twice, they have had scares and were lucky they escaped South Bend unscathed.

Josh Huesel is the man to watch in this game, and should dismantle a suspect Cornhusker defense that has given up more than 24 points three times this season.

The era of Nebraska dominance is over.

Sooners 38, Cornhuskers 24

#13 Ohio State @ #16 Purdue

I suppose this is the other game on the slate this week. Well, not to me. This game has Rose Bowl implications and features one of the most exciting players in the game.

History has to be on the side of the Buckeyes, as they won last year in Columbus and have not lost in West Lafayette since 1984. However, this is dangerous Boilermaker team, led by the most prolific passer in Big Ten history. With each game, Drew Brees is solidifying his candidacy for the Heisman Trophy. Brees has already passed for 2500 yards and 19 touchdowns, and he has another three games left.

The Buckeyes, however, are no pushover. They have the Big 10's best defense and a potent offense as they racked up 446 yards at Iowa last week.

and the Hokies were barely escaped contests at BC and Syracuse.

Not only that but Pitt is a good team—all joking aside. And I am not just saying this to make Penn State fans feel better.

The combination of John Turman's pass attack and Kevan Barlow's running game should give the Hokie defense all they can handle. Not only that, but the Panthers are on a roll as they spanked BC last week.

For the Hokies, can you say, "looking ahead to Miami?"

Too bad it will only mean something good for the Hurricanes.

Lehigh halts Bison win streak

By Cory Nadler

In a game in which the Bison took a lead into the fourth quarter against the no. 13 Lehigh Mountain Hawks, it is no surprise that head coach Tom Gadd was disappointed when his team came away with a 21-14 loss. Coming into this game riding a five-game winning streak, the Bison were looking to upset the Mountain Hawks and put themselves in great shape to win the Patriot League title. Their hopes looked to be coming true until their fourth quarter lapse.

The game looked as though it was going to be a defensive struggle for the entire game, as many have thus far for the Bison. The game was scoreless until midway through the second quarter when Lehigh completed a ten-play drive with a nine-yard touchdown pass to go up 7-0.

"Lehigh came out showing a pretty balanced offense," free safety Kevin Eiben '01 said.

But the Bison answered when Bucknell quarterback Lucas Phillips '01 engineered a long drive of his own, consisting of 17 plays and 72 yards. He capped off the drive with a one-yard touchdown plunge on fourth-down-and-goal.

This was only one of many drives that the Bison would start deep in their own zone due to poor field position. The combination of an exceptionally strong special teams unit on the part of Lehigh and sub-par play by the Bison special teams gave Bucknell bad field position throughout the day.

Bucknell offense was hurt by the absence of Jabu Powell '02. Even though LaMario Bradwell '01 and Jess Brinson '04 did a satisfactory job filling in for the injured Powell, the ground attack was clearly slowed.

The Bison began the scoring in the second half on a three-yard touchdown run by Brinson in the beginning of the fourth quarter; the run was Brinson's first collegiate touchdown. This gave the Bison a 14-7 lead with almost the entire fourth quarter remaining.

Just as the Bison had done in the second quarter, the Mountain Hawks drove the length of the field on the ensuing drive to tie the game at 14 with more than ten minutes remaining in the game. When the Bison could not put together another drive of their own, they were forced to punt.

Lehigh drove 79 yards this time and scored, taking the lead, 21-14. After being stymied by the Bison defense for the first three quarters, the Mountain Hawk offense moved the ball at will in the fourth quarter.

"They basically ran the ball and used more simple plays [in the fourth quarter]," middle linebacker Vince Ficca '01 said. "We just missed a lot of tackles."

Bucknell could not put together another scoring drive in the last three minutes of the game, and the 21-14 defeat ended the Bison's five-game winning streak.

LeMario Bradwell '01 shakes off a tackler and turns upfield.

As for Powell, he suffered an injury to the area around his spinal cord on his first run of the Lafayette game on Oct. 14. There is the chance that another hard hit could hurt him indefinitely. Powell traveled to Cleveland, Oh. on Tuesday for further tests to determine whether or not he will be able to return to action later in the season or ever again in his career.

Soccer loses but earns postseason birth

By Chuck Vicente

Despite losses to Villanova, Lafayette and Cornell this past week, things are looking bright for Bucknell women's soccer. The team recently clinched a spot in the Patriot League Tournament after being denied the past two seasons.

The Bison played Villanova on Oct. 18 and found themselves in the familiar overtime situation. Bucknell scored first when Ali Chandler '02 knocked a corner kick to Savannah Rennels '04. Rennels blasted in her seventh goal of the season, making the score 1-0.

The Bison were able to hold off the Wildcats for the rest of the first half and much of the second half, but Villanova attacked and scored a goal at the 60:36 mark.

With the score tied, the game was forced to overtime, a situation the Bison have faced seven times this season. But Bucknell could not put the ball away, and Villanova eventually scored to end the game in the second overtime.

Bucknell played a hard game against a tough team, proving that they can play on a higher level.

Forward Kristie Simon '04 battles a defender.

"They were fast and technical and did not think we could last with them," head coach Chrissy Findlay said. "We got them frustrated, and we sent the message to them that we are good enough not only to play with them, but to beat them."

Before the end of the half, another goal was on the board for the Bison. Karla Killian '03 took a free kick which was redirected by senior tri-captain Kristen Erb. Erb's shot found the back of the net to give Bucknell the lead at halftime.

Unfortunately, Bucknell could not hold Lafayette in the second half and lost, 3-2. A lack of team unity caused Bucknell to fall.

"We did not play well together and the lack of team effort was frustrating to watch," Findlay said. "We need to pull together as a team."

Bucknell faced Cornell on Tuesday night and lost 4-2. After the Big Red took a three-goal lead through the first half, Bucknell battled back.

Chandler added a goal off of an assist from Anna Hall '02. Rennels also scored a goal off of an assist from Kate Cramer '03. The Orange and Blue's efforts were not enough, as Cornell snapped their four-game losing streak with a win.

The Bucknell women's soccer team honored their only senior, Erb, in their game against Lafayette Saturday. Erb, who has contributed so much to the team's success and progress, is respected by everyone on the team.

"She will be such a big loss. She is a role model who leads by example," Killian said.

"She is a good example of determination, commitment and work ethic," Findlay said. "In addition, I have always been impressed with her team focus."

Erb and the rest of the Bucknell women's soccer team are not finished yet. They have one final game against Albany next Tuesday followed by the long awaited Patriot League Tournament.

Volleyball splits matches despite injuries

By Pat Evans

Injuries. It is rare that a team is not plagued with them at one point or another, but it is how a team reacts to them that shows character and builds strength.

Last weekend the Bucknell volleyball team was without pivotal players Jen Wrigley '03 and Shamree Landis '02. Friday night they suffered a loss to Fordham 0-3 (13-15, 3-15, 1-15). But Saturday the Bison showed their resiliency by bouncing back and improving their conference record to 6-1 by defeating Navy 3-0 (15-5, 15-11, 15-7).

"Our emphasis is on conference play, and we take away lessons from non-league play against teams like Fordham, which is good," head coach Cindy Opalski said. "I'd like to win both, but if I had my choice I'd take the conference wins."

The Orange and Blue came out strong against Fordham, and were actually leading in the first set, but couldn't string together the points needed to win.

Opalski realized that this match would be a learning experience so she found the right combination of players, which were used to defeat Navy in the next day's competition. Coming off of the loss Friday, the Bison knew that they could not afford a loss against the Midshipmen, a team that they had beaten when they were at full strength earlier in the season. All players rose to the occasion to replace the two sorely missed outside hitters.

"We were much more pumped for our match against Navy," Shannon Walker '02 said. Walker recorded 14 kills to help the Bison put away the Midshipmen.

Defensively, the Bison refused to let the ball hit the floor. Brandi Trappasso '04 led the way with a game-high 17 kills in the match.

Senior captain Brooke Bader had an outstanding match offensively, tallying 12 kills with only three errors for a .333 hitting percentage. "Everyone stepped up in the match," Bader said, "we all played with a lot of confidence."

The Bison outdid their previous performance against the Midshipmen despite the injuries. Navy was unable to take advantage of the wounded squad, and scored fewer points than they had against Bucknell earlier in the season.

Bucknell will defend their first place spot in the Patriot League when they face tough defensive team Holy Cross on Friday. Saturday's game against Army, who is 4-4 in the Conference, must not be overlooked either.

The better you are, the more people are going to gang up on you. Identify your stronger players, and try to shut them down," Opalski said. "We need other players to step up big if we want to continue to be successful."

I hate New York

Well, it's October, and life is good again in New York. The Yankees are going to win another World Championship, which will make it four times in five years. And I'm going to be sick again, which will also make it four times in five years.

But this World Series is special, right? They call it the "Subway Series," which means instead of beating the Braves, the Yankees get to trounce their crosstown buddies the Mets this year. Pretty special, huh?

The Yankees are the bully who shakes you down for your lunch money at recess. They're the mallet in the arcade game you use to bash the heads of little animals when they come out of holes. They're the bigger, more expensive toy train your best friend got at Christmas—the kind that blew real steam and went around the track four times before yours derailed on the first lap.

But a Yankees-Mets series, as much as I hate acknowledging it, does really have some intriguing elements to it. Like, why is Jose Canseco about to get another Championship ring? To prove that you can lead a gratifying career with only a heating pad and a remote control?

Like, where did all these Mets fans come from? I know New York's a big place, but I also know these are the same people who were Yankees fans last year, and the year before that, and the year before that...

But the Subway Series isn't all bad. By having both New York teams in the big one this year, it means one of them has to lose. In that way, you might call it a win-win situation. And, with the escalated rivalry and hatred between these two teams lately, it's possible they may both finally discover what the rest of the country has known for decades—how much fun it is to despise a New York baseball team.

Indeed, it's exactly this disgust for each other that's making this latest Subway Series an instant classic. There's some actual substance to this World Series; people are cheering for one team or the other instead of not caring. It's not another Braves-Yankees sleeper, thankfukilly, where we all already know the ending because we've seen it so many damn times.

The Clemens-Piazza squabble has been a blessing in disguise in terms of attracting fans to this series. Nothing attracts people like controversy; so in addition to the uniqueness of the first New York World Series since the 1950s, fans are being treated to a first-class dogfight as well.

Without being too critical of Roger Clemens, he's a crybaby who's in the twilight of his career and won't accept it. His best years are behind him—years where loyalty to a hometown team counted just as much to the fans as his blistering performances on the mound. He'll still win more games each season than he loses, but he's a streaky pitcher now who relies more and more on a split-fingered fastball to compensate for lost arm-strength. In any event, his days of being a number one starter are gone.

But so, it seems, are his good senses. Either that or he's been studying The Chuck Knoblauch Field Guide to Throwing a little too enthusiastically. Bussing someone back is one thing—even hitting a batter after a home run can legitimately be part of the game. But intentionally throwing at a batter's head is a completely different thing, one that the game simply has no room for.

Piazza's 7-12 (.583) lifetime against Clemens. That says, to me, that Piazza could wear an eye-patch, use a sugar wafer to bat against Clemens and still find a way to reach base. Ask Roger though, and apparently he'd tell you it means Piazza needs a little house cleaning, maybe by, say, a 95 mile-per-hour pitch to the head that could have left behind permanent damage.

Of course Clemens denied that the pitch was intentional. And there, by his side, was Joe Torre and company, all insisting Roger would never even consider such a thing.

Well I guess he's reconsidered since then. Because the first time he faced Piazza since that incident—Sunday night in the first inning of Game 2—Clemens was back to his old tricks. After Piazza broke his bat on a foul ball, Clemens picked up a splinter and threw it at Piazza, who was walking back to home plate.

Sound familiar? It should. Not that half a bat would have really done any harm to Piazza, but all the same it was a tasteless act by tactless pitcher. Every time poor Roger Clemens throws something lately, it seems like hapless Mike Piazza is in the way, right?

The benches cleared. Clemens should have been tossed out right there on the spot. He's since been fined $50,000 for going batby by Frank Robinson, who'd better now be wary of objects flying through his living room window. Does Clemens really have so little control over himself that he has to hurl everything in sight at opposing players? If this keeps up, pretty soon someone's going to catch a rosin bag in the eye or worse.

Anyone who disgraces the Yankees like Clemens did has done no wrong by me though. In Queens they already added his name to a certain list, right below a guy named John Rocker. True, it's appalling to see Clemens resorting to tactics that could get someone hurt, but the only real shame in this is that we probably won't get to see him pitch across town at Shea.

Forget bats and balls. Mets fans do love their batteries, you know.

New era begins with Rogers' inauguration

JELL-O discovered as new campus pollutant

By Heather Napolitano

Foundation seminar 091, "Our Local Environment," has taken an interactive approach to learning following the Sept. 19 discovery of an unnatural green substance in the stream that flows beneath Walker Ave. The class later identified this substance as waste material dumped into a storm drain following a JELL-O wrestling event sponsored by Activities and Campus Events (A.C.E.) three days prior.

Michael Molesevic, lecturer on the Common Learning Agenda and seminar professor, and the ten students compiled a report entitled "Environmental Report on the Dumping of Waste Material from the JELL-O Wrestling Event" dated Oct. 31, 2000.

"[This exercise] gave us a lot of insight into how things are addressed in the real world... This is how something [of this nature] would actually be processed," said member of the class James Bullock '04.

First-year students Dan Fellon and Matt Vanaskie originally discovered the material. The two, also members of the class, brought the issue to Molesevic's attention. The class believed it to be an issue worth pursuing.

"Everyone noticed a light green, whitish foam mixture floating on the top of the stream," Christine Jacoby '01 said.

In the three and a half weeks that ensued, the students contacted a range of involved parties and performed a series of tests.

The Novelty Wrestling Company of Catawissa, PA had run the wrestling event, which took place in Smith Quad. The company had been under contract with the University. The only reference to clean up made in the contract was that the University would provide access to hot water before and after the event.

In their report, the foundation seminar students allege that the company disposed of the material in the storm-drain behind Smith Hall, which later entered the stream via an underground storm drainpipe. The students attempted to contact the company to question their method of disposal.

"The wrestling company was inaccessible. They didn't return phone calls or emails," Bullock said.

Assistant Director of Campus Activities and Programs Kathy Arnett responded to the class's allegations in an email that serves as one of the appendices to the report.

"All the materials used were biodegradable substances... The base consisted of instant mashed potatoes and water, and lime JELL-O was added to the mixture," Arnett said in the email provided by the class. "The mixture was dumped in the drain because I was assured that all substances were biodegradable and would not kill any vegetation or fish."

The students' report further alleges that, although the material was biodegradable, it still had a negative impact on the stream life. The group analyzed the pH, Biological Oxygen Demand (BOD) and the dissolved solids levels.

The student report said that, "[Nutrient Management Specialist and Soil Scientist for the Pennsylvania Department of Environmental Protection] Jason Fellon said that most likely, the biological oxygen demand (BOD) from the JELL-O waste in as an audience of alumni, trustees and special guests joined the campus community to celebrate Rogers' inauguration as the University's 15th President.

While the ceremony looked to be his shining moment, Rogers stepped back and focused on the whole University; his inaugural speech, entitled "Bucknell University: Honoring the Past, Celebrating the Future," outlined his plans for the institution's future, including a ten-year strategic plan and a national marketing strategy.

In his speech, Rogers recalled the University's last strategic plan, Foundations for the Future, saying that all campus constituencies must work together to build on improvements made in the last decade. In his new plan, called Vision 2010, Rogers calls on faculty, staff, administrators, trustees and students to work together to surpass the status quo and build a better Bucknell.

"If our vision for 2010 is to be a success, we must continue to enhance, define, and redefine not only our programmatic plan, but our financial strategic plan as well," Rogers said Sunday. "Our programmatic strategic plan and our financial strategic plan must be one and the same—different approaches designed to reach the same set of goals."

In what Rogers called "an unusual set of circumstances," the Development Office will not be downsizing once the Bucknell campaign concludes next month. He said that in post-fundraising times, development offices tend to downsize and slow their progress, but Rogers reported that fundraising efforts will continue, looking to build on the campaign, which was the largest fundraising campaign in University history.

"Great goals are exciting to contemplate. But, to reach fruition, they must be financed," Rogers said in his speech. "We need to chart a course for increasing annual giving, increasing alumni giving, extending our post-campaign efforts, and setting an endowment goal of one billion-dollars or more by the year 2010."

In the wake of the E-Leaders@Bucknell symposium last month, Rogers believes that the University can develop a "comprehensive information technology and computing platform that can be a model for America."

He cited the importance of reevaluating our current plans for technological improvement, pointing out the need to inte-

Voter apathy hinders democracy

It's cold, it's November and there is ever so much to do. Besides, how could a lowly college student have an effect on the presidential election?

According to a recent survey released by political scientist Russell Dalton, only 53 percent of Americans suggest that low voter turnout is a result of complacency. Because the standard of living is fairly high, and the economy is doing well, it really doesn't matter which party wins. Others suggest that the two party system is to blame, as it seems they have become so centrist that either party would do the job.

Well, here is another statistic. The more educated an individual has become, the more likely he or she is to vote. Perhaps they know something that 47 percent of Americans don't.

A ballot is the keystone of democracy. It is what makes the government responsive to the people, and ensures that the constitution is upheld. So, the two party system sucks, you say... vote Green, Reform, Libertarian, or even Social Americans take part in elections, with an even lower percentage for the twenty-something age group. This is in contrast to other countries like Australia and Sweden who have traditionally had more than 90 percent of their citizens cast a ballot.

Gore, Bush nail issues to voters

By Brian Watson

As the presidential campaigns enter their final week, the Republican nominee, Texas Governor George W. Bush remains neck-and-neck with his Democratic counterpart, Vice President Al Gore. Both candidates are upping the ante for the homestretch, pitching policies and attacking their opponent's credibility, trying to rediscover the enormous voting bounces they received after their respective conventions.

With policy proposals taking a backseat to debates over the candidates' competency, both nominees continued campaigning for the all-important swing states, reaffirming their qualifications and questioning their counterpart's records.

During a West Coast sweep this week, Bush reinforced his leadership ability, telling a Portland, Ore. audience that he intends to end "finger pointing and name calling" in Washington. By keeping his distance from Republican leaders on Capitol Hill, Bush hopes to maintain a perception of individuality and bi-partisan ethic.

Gore's camp launched a series of attacks against Bush, calling the Texas Governor's proposal to divert social security funds for private investment and tax-cut plans "class warfare on the part of billionaires." Gore contends Bush's policies would only profit one percent of the population—the rich.

One of the most overriding issues facing voters is the question over the possible changing face of the Supreme Court. With three to four seats to be vacated during the next presidential administration, leftists argue that Bush will appoint pro-life justices that may very well overturn Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 case that legalized abortion.

Differences over educational policy may also help turn the tide on Election Day. Bush believes his teacher accountability programs present the best scenario for revitalizing the nation's school systems. He argues that Gore's plans for mass expenditures would do nothing to help the problem; Bush believes that the Vice President's spending programs will only increase the huge bureaucracy that he says breeds confusion and unreliability in Washington politics.

Gore's advisors faced a serious setback earlier this week when Green Party candidate Ralph Nader said he would, under no circumstances, back the Vice President. Nader's candidacy may prove to be the X-factor in the 2000 election, as his late-blooming insurgency and liberal platform stand to take important votes away from the Vice President.

Democratic leaders have urged Nader to cease campaigning in the crucial "battleground" states, though the Green Party nominee plans to hold rallies in these states up until next Tuesday. Nader's persistence has allowed Bush to campaign strongly in states like California—previously seen as a Democratic stronghold—where he trails the Vice President by a small margin.

Cole leads downtown cleanup

By Rebecca Rowland

Too often students at the University identify an issue that they feel passionate about and then do absolutely nothing about it. Senior Matt Cole, however, acted on his belief and is receiving University and state-wide recognition for his action.

Cole, a civil engineering major and member of Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity, decided to take a step towards improving town-gown relations and created a downtown Lewisburg clean-up project. In effect since Aug. 31, the project assigns a fraternity or sorority chapter to pick-up trash and other debris from downtown streets and sidewalks every Thursday, Saturday, and Sunday mornings by 10 a.m.

Cole conceived of the idea last semester with Matt Larson, who is also a member of SAE and Alex Boyer, both seniors who also live off-campus.

"We attended a borough council meeting last year because we were going to living off-campus," Cole said. "There were definitely major concerns that the townspeople had; one that has come up this year was noise and another was trash left on the street."

While we are all familiar with the noise issue, the problem of trash left over after a night of partying is a problem that many students may have overlooked. Both issues have resulted in strained town-gown relationships—something that Cole felt needed remedying.

"I would say that I have definitely become very interested in trying to get involved in relations with townspeople," Cole said. "I have definitely been affected by the view the townspeople have of Bucknell residents."

Tolerance and understanding need to once again be part of the relationship. With a school as small as the University and a town as small as Lewisburg, it is inevitable that tensions will arise. The crux of the issue, then, is whether or not any action will be taken to diffuse the tensions and appease both groups. As of yet, very little of this has been done.

"I think it's a few very loud townspeople that are kind of shouting the bad reputation and a few bad students that are creating that image," Cole said. "It will always exist but, in the past few years, it's been heightened because of the increase of partying downtown."

While eliminating all downtown parties is, at the present, not a viable option, Cole, Larson and Boyer recognized that something needed to be done.

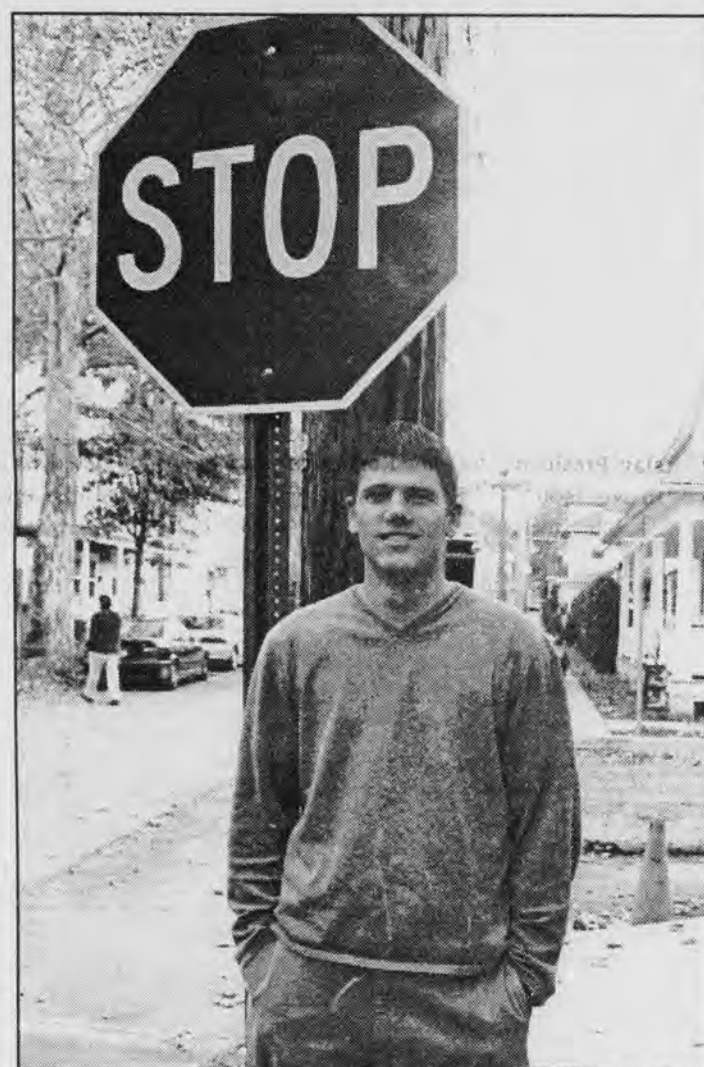

"The noise is something that is not going to go away," Cole said. "I mean, you can reduce it but elimination is a lot harder than going downtown three times a week for an hour and picking up trash."

Which is exactly what they decided to do. Approaching the issue at first as an SAE community service project, Cole went to borough president Yvonne Morgan for her feedback on the idea of starting a trash collection program.

[Yvonne Morgan] really encouraged me to set some sort of plan in action," Cole said.

But it wasn't until he talked to Dean Baker that Cole

Paige Cull—The Bucknellian

realized that he had the strength of a large Greek community available to him.

"In the beginning the program was just on a town-gown level but the Greek community has proven to be a great tool to use," Cole said. "We have an enormous Greek population so the work really diffuses into very few hours per person."

The Interfraternity Council and the Panhellenic Council both unanimously agreed to support Cole's idea. As it stands now, this is still an SAE project although each chapter involved can apply the number of hours they spend cleaning to their overall community service requirements.

"SAE administers the program and I check up and have to sign all the forms to make sure that they are getting done to my satisfaction," Cole said. "But it really is an equal responsibility—the whole Greek system has pitched in and helped and I think it has turned out quite well."

Turned out quite well it has and more than just the University has noticed. Many residents of Lewisburg have contacted the University expressing gratitude for the students' work and the Daily Item picked up on the story as well. Cole sees this as a positive sign that levels of tolerance in the community are increasing.

"I think that if something like this can help build tolerance then maybe that will prompt residents to give us a second chance here and there," Cole said. "That'd be nice."

All students that live or party in the downtown areas will benefit from this mutual respect as fines, police involvement and general tensions should subside. SAE plans to keep the project up next year as well and hopes for the continued support of the Greek and downtown communities.

"The credit should not be headed my way—it should be the whole Greek communities," Cole said. "Hopefully it will continue to get positive feedback and the time will come when it will be the norm to see a cleaner on the streets."

The participants clean from South Seventh Street to Hufnagle Park and from St. George Street to St. Louis Street.

Window blind strangulation danger prompts recall

WASHINGTON (CNN)—Millions of horizontal window blinds are being recalled because their pull cords and inner cords can form a loop that strangles infants, the Consumer Product Safety Commission announced Wednesday.

The CPSC said that since 1991, it has received reports of 130 strangulations involving cords on window blinds. Of that number, 114 strangulations involve the outer pull cords, and 16 involve the inner cords that hold the blind slats.

Blowing snow blocks travel in Wyoming, South Dakota

MOORCROFT, Wyoming (AP)—Up to 13 inches of blowing snow closed major highways Wednesday in eastern Wyoming and western South Dakota, stranding travelers and shutting down schools.

About 40 people, mostly truckers, were stalled at Moorcroft, which got about 5 inches of snow, said Toni Kornemann, an employee at the 24-hour Coffee Cup Fuel Stop along Interstate 90.

Staffing problems plague University

Fruitless attempts made by administration to avoid shortchanging dining services

By Jeff Rogan

Citing the strong economy and a low two percent unemployment rate in the region, the University has acknowledged that it has had difficulty filling staff positions at the University this year. The most visible area hit by this employment crunch has been Dining Services, where current employees have had to pick up more hours to keep the cafeteria and Bison running smoothly for the University community. About fourteen full-time, benefited positions are currently vacant in Dining Services, as well as numerous part-time and casual-worker positions.

Margaret Plympton, vice president of finance and administration, and Tim Tenon, the director of dining services, recognize the problem of the vacant positions and have tried, unsuccessfully so far, to fill them.

"We ran an ad in the local papers for two weeks looking for a chef," Tenon said. "Of the four responses we received, two had never cooked before," he said.

Moreover, the number of students seeking casual employment at the University has declined recently, also contributing to the staffing problems.

"There's simply not [many] student employees in any office," Plympton said.

"We have tried temp agencies, but they have not provided quality people," Tenon said. "We also have been looking at volunteer associations, who can work for dining services in exchange for contributions to their group." Unfortunately, neither source has provided enough workers to alleviate the employment problem.

The University is also trying to keep current staff and prevent a larger employment problem by offering certain casual workers some limited benefits.

However, Tenon explained that the University's Strategic Plan prevents the University from offering casual workers full benefits.

"If we were to offer full benefits to a Dining Services employee, it would be at the expense of another worker on campus," Tenon said.

"Someone else in the University community would have to lose their benefits."

Bucknell has not yet offered limited benefits to its casual employees. With the ever-increasing cost of healthcare, Plympton says providing additional University employees with healthcare would greatly increase the University's expenses.

The problem, with providing workers with increased benefits or a higher wage lies with the trade-offs the University would have to make to make these changes, Plympton clarified. Do we increase the comprehensive fee? Or do we cut costs somewhere else at the University?

"It's not an easy process to identify what we will not do," she said. "It is, however, a wonderfully easy process to identify all the things we must do."

Professor Charles Sackrey, associate professor of economics and advisor to the Bucknell Caucus for Economic Justice (BCEJ), offered a different solution to the employment crunch.

According to Sackrey, the solution would be to pay all employees what is known as a living wage. A living wage is defined as the minimum hourly rate a full-time worker needs in order to provide for a family, independent of welfare or other assistance like food stamps.

Citing the study "A Living Wage at Bucknell," authored by students in Economics 258 and Geography 209 last spring, Sackrey pointed out that the University's wages for many workers are far below what is necessary to allow a family to live above the poverty line. The findings of the report indicate that a family of one adult and one child living in Lewisburg would require a pre-tax hourly living wage of $10.78 to meet their minimal needs. For that same family living in Milton, a pre-tax hourly living wage of $9.00 would be required.

The report also stated that "a total of 231 Bucknell employees earn below $9.00 per hour."

"My concern is that I don't want us to think that if we could provide benefits for these folks, life would be wonderful," Plympton responded. "I think having benefits would be advantageous for some of the [casual] employees, and could provide additional recruitment or retention tool, but I don't want people to get too optimistic. What I believe is that the reason we don't have the employees has more to do with the low unemployment rate."

But Sackrey disagrees. "We're arguing for a living wage, and we're arguing that the University can afford it. In fact, not paying such wages means the University is ignoring its own 'mission' statement on the first page of its catalog!"

Plympton believes the living wage argument to be too idealistic or unrealistic because of the limited income of the University. Comparing the University to its peer institutions like Colgate, Plympton pointed out that Bucknell has a significantly smaller endowment and a lower comprehensive fee.

Plympton insinuated that if revenues increased, she would consider offering employees a living wage. "If there were another place where we could acquire $57,000, then we would do it."

Sackrey had several ideas as to where the money could come from. "I do know," he declared, "that people at the top make a whole lot of money and I know that there are people at the bottom at Bucknell that aren't making enough to live on."

"Most of us were supposed to have this past weekend off, and we all had to work. That makes it a stressful situation too because you are tired, and sometimes you are working at ten or eleven-day stretches."

Except for the extra hours and the extra stress, Bucknell's Dining Service workers receive nothing from the University—no pay raises, no bonuses, and for some, no benefits. "You're lucky if you get a thank-you for anything you do. It's a thankless job."

"You can go to McDonald's or any of the other various fast food places and make more than what we're making here. That's a proven fact," the employee added.

Several employees believe the University should compensate them in some way.

"I think that they should give us more money than they do, because it is short-staffed, and everybody is doing more than one person's share of work. If you think about it, $6.30, which is what most of us make, is not enough for what we do," remarked one Bison employee.

"We're worth at least $9 an hour!" said one, ardently.

Using the salary information he obtained from the Chronicle of Higher Education, Sackrey estimated that if the top five administrators would contribute $12,000 each of their annual salaries, Bucknell could get that extra $57,000 needed to increase wages of the 36 full-time workers making less than a living wage.

But funds for the living wage don't have to come out of compensation. "Why not get the $57,000 out of the $31.5 million dollar budget for the new sports complex?" he asked.

Yet while the administration tries to find solutions to the employment crunch, everyone at the University will have to endure, especially the staff.

"I don't think it's so much that we've had to work more hours," said one full-time worker. "It's more of a stressful thing."

In addition to regular hours, the University sometimes requires mandatory weekend work for special events, such as this past weekend's Presidential inauguration.

"We're worth at least $9 an hour!" said one, ardently.

"Basically, anything that needed oxygen wasn't getting it," Fellon said.

In the report's conclusion, students wrote, "We have determined that there were environmental violations and that the stream life was negatively affected by this dumping."

The class believes this environmental issue to be serious, and in need of address.

Jacoby said, "JELL-O dumping doesn't sound like a big problem, but it is like this is getting overlooked, then what else could be getting overlooked?"

Reunion dinner held for MG 101

By Laura Day

This past weekend, management students of the past and present gathered to celebrate the 20th Anniversary of this outstanding program. Management 101 has long been a popular course for many students at Bucknell. Its exciting curriculum and acclaimed faculty have attracted students for two decades to discover the world of management.

The MG 101 Reunion dinner was emceed by Professor of Management John Miller who founded the program in 1980. The evening was structured to reflect the organization of the MG 101 course, itself. It began with a reception at which each "mock" company's portfolio from the management courses was displayed and MG 101 alumni were able to reminisce. This part of the night was similar to the "Forming Phase" of the course, with the attendees beginning to think of themselves as a single coherent entity, graduates of the MG 101 course.

The reunion dinner followed the reception and included a variety of speakers and a jazz band. The first course of the dinner simulated the "Storming Phase" of the course. MG 101 alumni shared their favorite management stories and competed for the funniest or most meaningful. Casey Wells, '94, a manager with Anderson Consulting, spoke to the group on the impact the class has had on her life. She thanked Miller for his incredible work in creating "generations of manage-

Kate Hook, '02, commented that the most rewarding part of the course is "the community aspect."

"Our company was like a family," Hook said. As dinner concluded, and dessert was served, the "Informing Phase" began. In this step, attendees heard true stories of how their fellow alumni carried their MG 101 experiences into life after the University. Michael Wick-erham, '96, operations manager of Allegheny Steel Distributors, Inc. and Greg Morello, '90, founder of KNGT Logistics, Inc. both shared their stories of how MG 101 prepared them for their careers in management.

In the final segment of the evening, the "Adjourning Phase," the group was able to celebrate their accomplishments and bid farewell. In this phase, Hiller and the current teaching assistants of MG 101 presented Miller with a plaque, commemorating his outstanding efforts in the creation of MG 101 and in its continued existence. On the plaque was a quote from Plato: "Those who tell stories also rule society."

Both Professor Miller and Professor Hiller have been instrumental in the development of the MG 101 program at the University. Miller concluded the evening wishing the alumni great success and ensuring that here at Bucknell, "we will keep generating stories."

grate different scenarios to develop innovations including more interactive classrooms and an electronic library.

According to Rogers, these technological and financial improvements must be accompanied by an administrative addition—the search for a Provost.

At his previous position as provost and vice president for academic affairs at Clemson University, Rogers saw the value of such a position; he said that his president "clearly defined (him) as second in cess at his former university, where a major promotional campaign helped the school skyrocket to greater prominence.

According to Rogers, Clemson's strategy resulted in Time magazine naming it among the best public universities in the nation.

While a marketing strategist is yet to be hired, the President plans to recruit help from an expert in the near future.

A crucial part of the plan involves Rogers and his wife traveling to meet different constituencies to try to make an impact on the national scene.

These wheels have already been put in motion with the start of the Orange and Blue Presidential Tour, which Rogers said presents a chance "for [the and Athena] to go out and meet the external constituencies, like alumni, parents and friends."

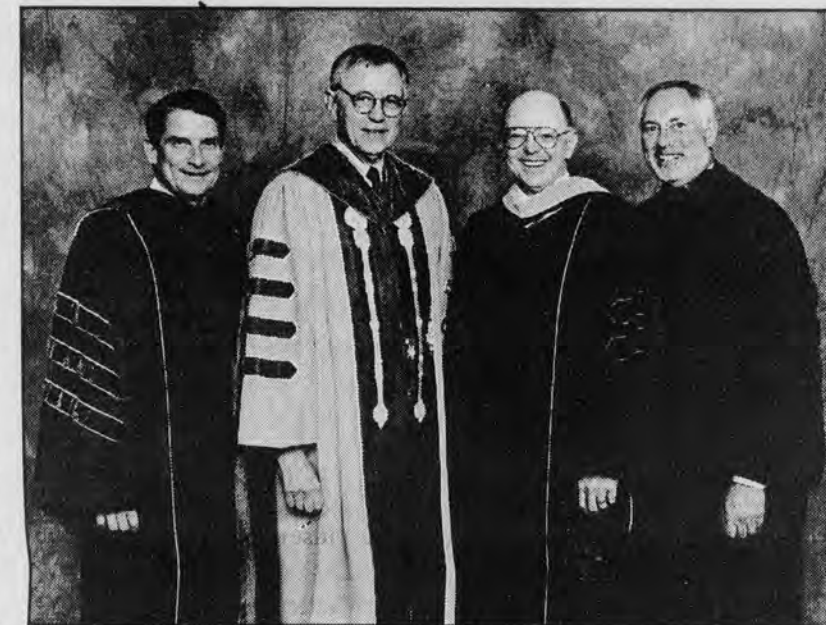

"You can only be the new president once, so it's an opportunity for me to go out and talk about the University, what our plans are, and get them excited," he said.

The tour began last month, with the Rogers' traveling both officially and unofficially to meet alumni clubs and University supporters in Chicago, New York and Pittsburgh.

A further itinerary has already been planned, as the couple plans to visit cities from Seattle to Boston.

In conclusion, Rogers set personal goals for his presidency. "I want the sixteenth President of this University to feel my presence when she or he walks down that hall past the pictures of the 15

Election Day Spectacular

Experience picks the president

By Melissa Finklestein

Sometimes I feel like the lone Gore supporter in a decidedly conservative environment here at Bucknell—or maybe I just haven't met others like myself. However, I am someone who cannot stomach the thought of having to look at Dubya's knit brows or hear his weasel laugh for the next four years. Three months ago, I was an undecided voter who knew very little about either candidate other than the fact that Al Gore was the vice president and George W. Bush was the son of former President Bush. While some people are not much more informed than that, I made it my mission to make an educated decision on Nov. 7, as it would be the first time I could vote in a major election. I am now convinced that the only educated decision possible is in favor of Al Gore.

The low point for me was watching Jim Lehrer in the second presidential debate quiz Governor Bush about his thoughts on a variety of military interventions. It was almost comical to me to watch a seemingly confused and befuddled Bush arbitrarily agree with or oppose the use of military actions. Ask Al Gore to answer the same question and we can expect some intelligent responses. Bush supporters are not concerned about his lack of experience (and knowledge) with foreign affairs because at least he has Cheney, his running mate. Why isn't he running for President, then? And hey, we like George W. Bush because he's a nice guy, so who cares if he has trouble putting a sentence together? Who cares if he hasn't done things in Texas that he thinks he can do for the entire nation regarding education and health care? It must be easier to listen to Dubya take credit for a patients bill of rights that he actually vetoed in his state in 1995 and 1997. I guess a lot of people would like to ignore that a Patients Bill of Rights is being opposed by the Republican majority in Congress.

I am a proponent of the belief that in elections we often must choose between the lesser of two evils. I am not going to say that I think Al Gore is the most amazing politician in the history of the world. FDR he is not. But if experience matters, he wins out. If being articulate counts for anything, he is our man. Unfortunately, people criticize Gore because he sounds like he knows more than the average person, whereas Bush doesn't have this fault. I trust Gore to appoint Supreme Court judges who will make decisions in line with what I believe is most beneficial for this country. Roe v. Wade will never be overturned, and I'd like to see Justices who won't waste their time trying. I trust Al Gore to reform Medicare because he has presented a sound plan for doing so. Guy King, former chief actuary of Medicare, expressed these sentiments in his statement to CNN regarding Bush's plan. It does not provide sufficient detail to judge the cost or long-term impact. Vagueness is always the way to go when you don't want the American people to know your true intentions, as witnessed with Nixon and his peace plan for the Vietnam War. lions of Americans cannot afford. Gore stated the following at the third debate in St. Louis: "I want to work for universal free school." And he has an actual detailed plan to accomplish this goal. When Al Gore speaks, I find myself nodding my head in agreement with his plan. His visions, his understanding of the issues. When George W. Bush speaks, I'm not puzzled by what he is trying to express, I am scared. I am scared that he will go to a foreign affairs summit and lack the experience to make decisions in the best interests of our country. The comfort I take is in the fact that thousands of specialists in Washington can compensate for his shortcomings. I just hope he will be able to decipher between good and bad advice. At least Jay Leno won't run out of Quayleisms, or as they are now termed, Bushisms if he enters office. But I'd rather support a leader of the free world who has convinced me that he has what takes to fill those shoes.

I'm not going to criticize Al Gore for being intelligent, articulate, and in command of issues that affect me, my country and the world in which I live.

A legacy in the making

By Brian Watson

It seemed like George W. Bush came out of nowhere, but come Nov. 7, he'll be guiding the U.S. in a new direction.

For the past six years, Bush has kept a low profile as the Governor of Texas, the nation's second-largest state. He worked on his father's presidential campaigns but always tried to stay out of the spotlight. It appeared that big brother Jeb, the Governor of Florida, was the one to carry on the political tradition.

That all changed almost three years ago. While sitting in his office, one of W's top aides handed him a tracking poll revealing him to be the top presidential prospect from either party.

Soon after, Republican leaders approached him, destined to anoint him as their chosen leader to usher out the Clinton years and usher in another GOP administration. Now Bush stands neck-and-neck with the Democratic candidate, Vice President Al Gore, in what may be the closest-ever presidential election.

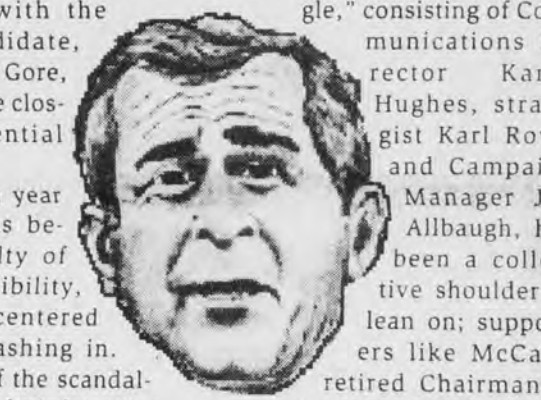

In an election year where policy has become the casualty of likeability, credibility, and leadership-centered polls, Bush is cashing in. Americans tired of the scandal-ridden Clinton Administration want a reliable, honest leader. That's Bush's message-elect me, move on, and forget the Clinton years; forget the questions of impropriety and infidelity and focus on new goals. He has constantly proclaimed himself as the best leader to bring unity and hope back to presidential politics.

Gore begs to differ. This week, in its homestead effort to paint Bush as the inexperienced presidential wannabe, the Gore campaign has constantly attacked Bush's readiness and credibility against his candidate's years of experience. Bush was quick to fire back: "He is surrounded and supported by interest groups that exist to oppose reform," Bush said at an Albuquerque, New Mex. campaign stop. "He seems guided by polls and focus groups that drain politics of its courage."

Gore has often reacted by labeling his opponent as a puppet of special interests. While many big businesses have thrown support to the Texas Governor, Gore is no stranger to massive contributions. In fact, Gore's fundraising habits have been the subject of numerous inquiries and have led to the conviction of a former aide linked to the Vice President's visit to the Hsi Lai Buddhist temple.

Gore claims that Bush's likely big business-friendly policies will damage the country's current prosperity. He also credits the Clinton Administration with introducing this prosperity. But, in actuality, since the President is limited in his economic influence, Clinton and Gore can not truthfully be given such praise. The best thing Clinton has done for the economy was to reappoint Alan Greenspan, originally a Republican appointee, as chairman of the Federal Reserve.

Gore undoubtedly knows Washington inside and out. Bush is happy he doesn't. While Gore

His campaign's "Iron Triangle," consisting of Communications Director Karen Hughes, strategist Karl Rove, and Campaign Manager Joe Albaugh, has been a collective shoulder to lean on; supporters like McCain, retired Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Colin Powell, and Desert Storm General Norman Schwarzkopf provide Bush with first-hand experience in various issues. Besides these potential cabinet members, Bush has gained the support of numerous interest groups and high-profile citizens who have expressed the need for fresh leadership.

What is the role of Wall Street?

Stock market trends have predicted the winner in 22 of the last 25 presidential elections

By Jim Leahy

If you have paid attention to the news over the past eight years, Bill Clinton hasn't been the only one getting a fair amount of attention. The New York Stock Exchange and NASDAQ are now some of the most popular news items because the money they use belongs to many of America's citizens. These people are rooting for candidates based on political views. But who is Wall Street rooting for and what outcome next Tuesday will have the greatest effect on the fortunes of America?

If you read The New York Times on Wednesday Nov. 1, the overall rise in stock market fortunes in since April is enough to predict the winner of the election. If the Dow goes down in the period between April and Election Day, the incumbent party loses the election. But if there is an overall upward trend, the incumbent party is victorious. So Al Gore, the keys to the White House are yours. And in case you were wondering about this indicator's accuracy, the Times contends that it has correctly predicted 22 of the last 25 races. But it really isn't as clear-cut as that.

Truthfully, Wall Street is probably rooting for more of the same gridlock that has spread through Washington in the past few years. Historically, the markets have done better with Democrats in power - probably the reason for the current administration's belief that the strength of the stock market has everything to do with its policies and practices. Actually, this is not true. Most of the credit for recent successes has to do with the companies stocks that trade in these markets. Because of the continuing strength of industry, Wall Street has rallied.

But are there any real trends that may point to good times ahead? The Stock Trader's Almanac points out that since 1952, election years have, with the exception of one, provided overall gains from the April to December period. And a study recently released by Merrill Lynch provides even more good news. There isn't really any evidence to point to a particular governmental setup that will continue the strength of the Street. Regardless of who is president, the markets will go about their business.

One such reason for this is that the current administration has shifted the stereotypes hanging over the two main parties. The Democrats have provided the country with budget surpluses and are no longer seen as the party to wreck the system. In Nassau County in New York, for instance, the Republican government has ruined the finances of one of the country's richest counties and stands to lose big on Tuesday.

But what will really happen for the last few weeks of this year and in the first half of 2001 while 1600 Pennsylvania's new resident moves in and sets up his administration? The answer is not much - especially if the party that lost in the presidential race controls the Congress. Unlike many drivers, Wall Street loves gridlock. It keeps both sides working against each other and honing their proposals to fit the needs of the other party and makes them conform to the status quo.

The maintenance of the status quo is an idea that many Americans share with Wall Street. A government that keeps our lives stable and happy goes unnoticed and doesn't have to do too much. Many Americans hate groundbreaking legislation because it has too many effects on our daily lives. And a divided government isn't likely to pass too much groundbreaking legislation that will send stocks into a tailspin.

So on Election Day, you will not be the only one watching the debates closely. Although the outcome may never matter, Wall Street will have high expectations of the new President and Congress to continue to allow this country to grow and prosper and allow its stocks to do just the same.

Rick Lazio greets reporters while campaigning for the New York Senate.

Who will control Congress?

By Josh Guyan

With the presidential election so close it is easy to forget that both the House and Senate are up for grabs next week as well. Actually it's more likely that the Republicans will hold very slim majorities in both houses, but a Democratic takeover is possible.

The Democrats need a net gain of seven seats in the House and five seats in the Senate to wrest control from the Republicans. Most likely, the Democrats will pick up three House seats and one or two Senate seats.

The House

"This is going to be the closest margin of control in decades," Steve Elmendorf, chief of staff to House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt (D-Mo.), said.

The Republicans must defend 26 open seats and have 12 incumbents in trouble. The Democrats must defend nine open seats and have six incumbents in trouble. Essentially, there are 24 seats currently held by Republicans in play and 10 or less seats held by Democrats in play.

The key battleground states include California, Florida, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Most important will be the grassroots get-out-the-vote efforts to turn out each party's base. The Democrats are able to mount significant challenge thanks to increased fundraising, although they still fall short of the Republicans.

The Senate

According to David Rosenbaum of The New York Times whichever party ends up in control of the Senate will have the slimmest majority in more than 40 years. There is also the possibility of an evenly split Senate 50-50.

In that event the vice-president would cast the tie-breaking vote for which party runs the committees and sets the agenda. The only time in history that has happened was in 1881 and 1882. It ended up causing, as Senate historian Richard A. Baker stated, "organizational chaos."

Senator Joseph Lieberman, the Democrats' candidate for vice president, has complicated this possibility. Say the Democrats pick up four seats including Senator Lieberman's in Connecticut. If Gore and Lieberman win the White House, then Lieberman will have to give up his Senate seat.

Connecticut's Republican governor John Rowland would appoint a Republican to fill the vacated seat and the Republicans would enjoy a one-seat majority. If Bush and Cheney win the White House then Cheney would cast the tie-breaking vote for Republican control of the Senate.

Either way the Democrats have to pick up five seats to get a majority in the Senate. "I think the Democrats have, maybe, a 20 percent chance of taking over the Senate. I can see them picking up two or three seats. Four is hard. Five is really, really hard," says Stuart Rothenberg who publishes a nonpartisan newsletter tracking the Senate races.

David Rosenbaum breaks the race down into 13 seats in play, eight currently held by Republicans, and five held by Democrats. He further breaks it down into seven key, tight races. Here are a few of the more interesting ones.

The first is in Missouri. Missouri's governor Mel Carnahan was killed October 16th in a plane crash. He had been even in the polls against Republican Senator John Ashcroft. His name is still on the ballot and he is still even in the polls.

Missouri's new governor Roger Wilson has said he will appoint Jean Carnahan, the former governor's widow to the seat if Governor Carnahan should win. Ms. Carnahan announced Monday she would accept the appointment.

The second is the infamous New York senate race between Hillary Rodham Clinton and Representative Rick Lazio. This is both the most high profile and expensive senate race in the country. The candidates are dead even in the polls after Ms. Clinton had sustained a small lead only a few weeks ago.

The last race of interest is in Virginia. Democratic Senator Chuck Robb received the endorsement on Saturday of Virginia Governor Douglas Wilder, the nation's first and only black governor. That could be the boost he needs to beat Republican challenger former Governor George Allen. Senator Robb narrowly defended his seat in 1994 by three points against Republican Oliver North who raised five times more money. Governor George W. Bush claims he will end the partisan bickering in Washington. A President Bush with a Republican controlled Congress is much more likely than a President Gore with a Democratic controlled Congress.

Alternatives to "Republicrat" monopoly

By Peter Van Emburgh

The abolition of slavery, women and African Americans' right to vote, environmentalism and progressive reform are not fundamental landmarks established by our long-standing Republican or Democratic platforms. In fact, these issues are championed by the "third party" system. Green Party Presidential candidate Ralph Nader, Reform Party Presidential candidate Pat Buchanan, and a handful of others are offering an alternative for voters tired of voting for the "lesser of two evils."

Nader and Buchanan aren't kidding themselves. They know they aren't going to win a trip to the White House, but they are running to change the climate of America. Both carry on, tirelessly campaigning for a more just, peaceful and democratic country.

Every four years, the elusive "third party" haunts the major parties, precisely because it challenges the bipartisan power on the political and economical system. While some third parties focus exclusively on one issue, some take on the entire "decaying" of American democracy.

Despite being the biggest party on the "left" and garnering over 600,000 votes in the '96 Presidential Election, the bipartisan Commission on Presidential Debates refused to allow Green Party candidate Nader to participate in any of the three televised debates this fall. This year, the Commission decided, a week before the debates, that a candidate must gain the approval of 15 percent of opinion poll respondents in order to participate. Their decision reaffirms the role of big money in presidential campaigns, since a modest financially-backed candidate such as Nader would benefit from the national televised exposure.

Look at Jesse "The Body" Ventura. In 1998, the third party candidate shocked the nation by grabbing the Minnesota gubernatorial seat. Six weeks before the election, Ventura had a paltry 10 percent poll rating. Then came the gubernatorial debates in which the Reform Party was allowed to represent. Ventura body-slammed his opponents in the debates (not literally) and watched his support rise to a 21 percent rating, according to the Star-Tribune poll. Without airing one televised ad before the debates, Ventura's appearance on the debates propelled his popularity to the governorship of Minnesota.

Many critics believe that the Democrats are moving more right and the Republicans more left; leaving many voters with virtually no alternatives. Along comes along someone like Ralph Nader.

Although Nader may not be a seasoned politician, he has been lurking around Washington for quite some time. About thirty-five years ago, Nader launched an attack against corporate giants that prey on unsuspecting "consumers." The water we drink, the seat belts we strap on, the air we breathe all of this has been affected somehow or another from the relentless work of Nader. Nader receives much praise and respect stemming from his non-stop offensive against corporate power and moneyed interests.

Nader's latest poll rating from the Gallup Organization was a measly three percent. Imagine what it would be if the media didn't ignore his candidacy.

The media doesn't hide the fact that they shortchange third parties. A New York Times article admitted the hidden presence of Nader and the impact that his candidacy could impose on the election. Since Gore and Nader agree on many environmental issues, the Gore campaign is justifiably worried that some of Gore's supporters could swing towards Nader.

Think about it. How often have you heard someone say "Well I wanted to vote for candidate X, but they'd never win. I didn't want to waste my vote, so I picked candidate Y." The media doesn't exactly encourage voting for third parties. It takes a fat wallet of millions of dollars before the media classifies the candidate as a "serious contender."

However, Nader is turning heads with his effective grassroots campaign style. On August 25, over 10,000 people showed up in Portland, Ore. for the biggest political rally of the year to date.

Nader is increasingly outspoken on several key issues: the realm of politics and economics intertwined with environment (hence, the Green Party), the military, restructuring the capitalist system health care and even foreign policy. He proposes a stop to nuclear production and deep cuts in the Defense budget. He proposes real labor law reform, national health care, putting tax money back into schools and fighting "environmental racism," according to Nader's campaign website (www.votenader.org).

According to Clamor magazine, other notable alternatives to Ralph Nader on Tuesday include the New Party, the Constitution Party, the Reform Party and the Libertarian Party.

The New Party has somewhere around 10,000 members that fight to establish a rule to allow candidates to run on more than one party's ticket. The platform states, "We believe in democracy. Corporations and 'technocrats' shouldn't rule this country. The people should."

The Constitution Party is ultra-conservative with radically religious ideologies that include the condemning of all abortions, including rape or incest. They reject the policies to allow women in the military and they believe that all teaching is related to God and man. What makes a family? One woman and one man, they say.

Reform Party was born from the ashes of Ross Perot's run at the presidency. Their platform focuses much attention on the elimination of corruption in government in order to obtain the "highest ethical conduct" for politicians.

The left-wing Libertarian Party members suggest that the defense budget be slashed, war on drugs ended and they actually consider immigration to be a good thing. The free market is the answer to all of humanity's problems, according to Libertarians.

Alternative parties still serve an important function in bringing issues to the national spotlight that the big wigs in Washington refuse to touch.

Is it possible for a third party candidate to win the presidential election? Doubtful - but you may have to ask Teddy Roosevelt or Abraham Lincoln.

ist for that matter. It is only when those frustrated with the system present an alternative that things change. Even if these parties don't win, their presence and popularity will alert mainstream parties to the issues they represent and that their followers support.

Furthermore, the two party system that exists in this country is not like one in England. All politicians are independent to a certain degree, and few vote strictly upon party lines. In voting for president we are not voting for a particular party, we are voting for the individual. Is anyone willing to argue that Governor George W. Bush and Vice President Al Gore are essentially the same candidate?

Still, some say that elections don't effect people in our age. How about this:

You and your girlfriend/boyfriend are having sex and using birth control. You or your girlfriend gets pregnant. Would you consider an abortion? Many political insiders suggest that this election could ultimately end up determining the fate of the Roe v. Wade decision, and could threaten the legality of abortions. Is that a right worth voting for?

When you get out of school and start making money, is it ok with you that in some cases the government will end up taking half your income? The government then puts it in low interest bonds, and claims that they are looking out for your future. Do you think that you should be able to invest at least some of that money yourself, and make some extra cash for your retirement? Is this issue worth voting for?

This has the potential of being one of the closest presidential elections in American history, and the electoral college could come down to three or four "battleground" states. Because Pennsylvania is one of these key states, each person's vote takes on all the more significance.

The point is that elections are something in which every person should take part. If a democracy is operating at its full potential, everyone can feel represented and minority issues will be addressed.

If we allow ourselves to fall between the cracks as a voting bracket, the country will be run by old people and Republicans, as they seem to be the only ones interested. What young American wants that?

Bucknellian staff picks the next president

Anyone who thinks Bush is a lightweight entering this election is seriously wrong. Like Gore, he is an Ivy League grad. Unlike Gore, he has an MBA from Harvard. I think that people have misinterpreted his public speaking skills as a lack of intelligence. Actually, the man is very smart and will do just fine as the successor to Bill Clinton.

-Jim Leahy '03

The imminent presence of the third party will greatly affect the outcome of this year's presidential election. Entering the voting booth, I believe that third party supporters will ultimately decide to cast their vote for Vice President Gore under the "lesser of two evils" mentality. This will provide Gore with a much-needed boost in votes to prevent being "Bush-whacked."

-Pete Van Emburgh '02

On his spree of last minute campaigning, Bush is picking up votes from states with a larger electoral college. I think in the end, Bush's consistency on abortion, capitol punishment and tax plan will earn the respect of voters.

-Natalie Casp '02

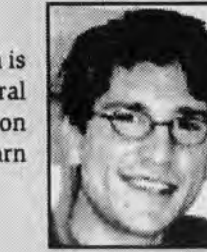

Unfortunately, I think Bush will win over Gore because of the many people who are voting for Nader instead of Gore. I would vote for Nader because I believe strongly in his platform, but the danger of Bush winning is too high to risk it. If Bush wins, I think I'll move to another country. It will be an embarrassment if he moves into 1600 Pennsylvania Ave. next January.

-Paige Cull '01

You heard it here first, folks! In the biggest surprise since Truman defeated Dewey, Ralph Nader will become the 43rd chief executive. "Why?" you ask. Because everyone will realize neither of the other two candidates are anything to write home about, and I always root for the underdog.

-Adam Haas '01

Bush is going to win the election, and be president just like his daddy. And hopefully, like his father, Dubya's term will be short and uneventful. My advice: move to Canada. It's cheap, you can gamble, and sentences end in eh?

-Tim Scheu '01

Had you written for B&P, this could be a good place for your manifesto, if you had a manifesto. Come to think of it, what is a manifesto? Do you have to be crazy to write one like the Unibomber, or does it have to be revolutionary like Marx? Either way, watch out in the coming weeks for my manifesto. Setting an international agenda

By Michael Boland

Among the many issues voters must consider on Nov. 7 is foreign policy. Currently, the U.S. military is stationed in many places around the world; some would say it has undertaken too many missions and is spread too thin. Each of the presidential candidates has a different vision of the role of the United States in global affairs. The election of Al Gore or George W. Bush would have a drastic effect on the positioning and deployment of American troops: one of many key differences between the two candidates.

Vice President Gore has indicated that if elected, he would continue policies in line with a dominant theme of the Clinton era: that as a global power the United States, can and should act as a "policeman," intervening either diplomatically or militarily in conflicts around the world. He made this clear from the beginning of his campaign. In October 1999, in a debate with Democratic primary opponent Bill Bradley, Gore stated, "We're the natural leader of the world. I don't think that's a chauvinist American statement-I think it's a statement of fact...We have to accept that mantle of leadership, and when there is terrible violence in the rest of the world, we have to pay careful attention to it."

As president, the standard that he would apply to international situations calling for U.S. intervention would be, "defined in terms of our values." Such a standard of review would probably open the door to more globalist, interventionist policy, as any armed conflict anywhere in the world will inevitably lead to atrocities and morally outrageous conditions. While Gore favors immediate and unconditional payment of back U.S. dues to the United Nations, he may have to ask ed Nations, he may have difficulty pushing that past a Republican Congress. Powerful conservatives such as Sen. Jesse Helms have asked for a certain measure of internal U.N. reform before releasing the funds.

Texas Governor George W. Bush obviously has less foreign policy experience than the vice-president, but has established a clear set of principles that would guide future decisions as to where to send U.S. troops. The purpose of our military, Bush is fond of saying, is "to fight and win wars."

Thus, he has expressed skepticism about U.N. "peacekeeping" missions, as currently defined in such regions as Kosovo. In the second presidential debate, he made especially clear his opposition to "nation-building" missions, which Vice-President Gore tends to support. In a recent interview with The Washington Post, Bush also emphasized that he would never forfeit U.S. sovereignty and allow American soldiers to fall under the command of the United Nations. Gore has not yet made such a pledge.

Bush's standard for military intervention seems higher than Gore's: Bush would authorize use of American troops if and only if the mission was clearly defined, troops and equipment were "trained and equipped to win," and there was a "clear exit strategy" (so as to avoid getting "bogged down"). Observers also note that Bush's people have not exactly discouraged rumors that in a Bush administration, widely respected Republicans Colin Powell and Condoleezza Rice would play prominent roles in conducting foreign affairs. Bush's running mate, Dick Cheney, is a former Secretary of Defense; all of these factors may alleviate concerns that Governor Bush lacks the foreign policy experience to function as president.

All of this speculation and posturing presupposes that voters do in fact care about candidates' foreign policy views; evidence is mixed. A July 25 Gallup poll reveals that while a majority of voters view military readiness and foreign policy as "very or extremely important," these issues are not the ones on which most citizens base their votes. On a list of issues that also included taxes, abortion, gun control and education, "national defense" came in 10th and "foreign policy" 12th, in order of those issues which matter most to voters. In short, voters care, but not enough to act directly upon their concern. Only two percent of respondents said that foreign policy would be "the single most important issue in influencing [my] vote for president."

No one is saying that foreign policy is an unimportant function of the president's duties. But fighting over 2 percent of the vote, then, neither Bush nor Gore seems to be able to extract any significant electoral advantage from his views on foreign policy.

Electoral College stands between you and the president

By Rebecca Rowland

So you think that when you vote, you are electing the president, don't you? You think that, in this great democracy of ours the government is for the people, by the people and that one person equals one vote.

Well that is not true. There is an institution standing between you and the president and that is the Electoral College.

When the votes are tabulated, it is determined what percent of each state voted for each candidate. The state is then determined to have been "won" by the Democrats, the Republicans, or the Independents. Whichever party wins the state gets all of the state's electoral votes. A candidate only needs 270 electoral votes to win the presidency.

Under the current system it is entirely possible that the candidate receiving the majority of the popular vote may still lose. The four states with the largest amount of electoral votes are California, New York, Pennsylvania and Florida. If one candidate wins all four of these states and their electoral votes they will win the election regardless of what happens in the 46 remaining states. That means that a candidate can become elected President even if only four states want him to be.

This has happened three times in history with the elections most recently in 1888. It could, in fact, happen next Tuesday. If Gore were to win a number of important states like Missouri and Kentucky by small margins while losing big states like Texas and North Carolina, by large margins, he could garner the required 270 electoral votes - even while Bush was winning the nationwide popular vote majority.

This system is a throw back to the time when government was actually not by the people but rather by the most powerful people. Up until the first half of this century neither senators nor presidential candidates were elected by the general public. The government had the good sense to get rid of those elitist ways of governing but allowed the electoral college to stay. The President of the United States of America is elected by an indirect vote. While we send troops half way around the world in order to make sure each country has a freely elected leader, we ignore the fact that our own leader is nothing of the sort.

In the upcoming election there are key differences in the ways Bush, Gore, and Nader will handle social security, education, taxes, abortion rights, and the environment. These issues are what people have in mind when they enter the voting booth so how is it fair that, in the end, it doesn't matter what the people want?

This system also make it impossible for a third party candidate to ever come close to winning the presidency. While large numbers of individuals may support them, they will win nowhere near enough votes to win states and gain electoral votes.

Perhaps it will take a political catastrophe next week in order to get the electoral college system disbanded.

Candidates discuss abortion policy

By Natalie Casp

As our presidential candidates race towards the finish line, abortion and the female vote flop around like loose shoelaces waiting to trip up the contenders. It's a close race, but someone's going to fall flat on his face before Nov. 7 arrives.

Like with most of the other issues, there's a clear distinction between the two presidential candidates. Al Gore supports a woman's right to choose while George W. Bush believes that the procedure should be illegal.

This election season, however, tosses in a twist for the traditional right vs. wrong abortion debate. In September, the Food and Drug Administration approved the controversial European manufactured RU-486. With this approval of a pregnancy-ending drug, abortion resurfaces as a major issue, specifically among female voters. To add a more political spin on the issue, judicial appointees by the president-to-be will play a significant role in the status of the legality of abortion.

In the series of candidate debates this fall, neither candidate admitted to selecting Supreme Court justices based on an abortion litmus test. If Gore were to win the election, his appointees, however, are expected to be pro-choice. "It'd be very likely that [my appointees would] uphold Roe v. Wade. But I do believe it's wrong to use a litmus test," Gore said in the candidates' debate on Oct. 3.

Surely Gore can't assume, litmus test or not, that his appointees would emphatically be pro-choice, given all the opinions he must, as president-elect, consider when appointing a justice to the Supreme Court.

Yet on June 28, a newspaper reported that Gore said the next president's Supreme Court nominees will decide the legality of abortion. As a candidate, Gore likely anticipates that he himself will be making those Supreme Court appointments.

Bush, on the other hand, maintains that any of his appointees to the Court would uphold a strict interpretation of the Constitution. While the legality of abortion has a specific place in a strict interpretation of the Constitution, Bush does not place an extra emphasis on abortion when considering potential justices.

"Voters should assume that I have no litmus test on that issue or any other issue. The voters will know I'll put competent judges on the bench, people who will strictly interpret the Constitution and will not use the bench to write social policy," Bush said in the same debate.

On Sept. 30, Gore opposed partial-birth abortions, but also opposed banning the procedure. Days later on Oct. 3, Gore supported a proposed ban on partial-birth abortions, except for when the mother's health is in jeopardy.

Bush consistently opposes partial-birth abortions. "I know we need to ban partial-birth abortions. This is a place where my opponent and I have strong disagreements. I believe banning partial-birth abortion would be a positive step toward reducing the number of abortions in America. This is an issue that's going to require a new attitude. We've been battling over abortion for a long period of time. Surely this nation can come together to promote the value of life."

Too bad Bush isn't campaigning with the 1984 version of Gore. On Jan. 30, The Boston Globe printed a statement that contradicts Gore's current position on abortion.

"It is my deep personal conviction that abortion is wrong," Gore wrote to a constituent in 1984 when he was representing Tennessee in the House. "Let me assure you that I share your belief that innocent human life must be protected, and I have an open mind about how to further this goal."

Also in January during a democratic debate with Bill Bradley, Gore stumbled on his position for financing abortions. Bradley pointed out that Gore voted against Medicare-funded abortions, but now he supports them.

Bush, as always, refuses to support government funding for abortions.

So Gore can't decide what he wants, but he does know that he wants women to choose what's right for them.

Faith in our future

The University witnessed a historic milestone last weekend, as Stephen Rogers was formally inaugurated as the University's 15th President. In an impassioned speech, Rogers defined his innovative plans and his desire to impact the future of the University. The Bucknellian Editorial Board foresees a new era, as outlined in his "Vision 2010" plan, of rapid improvement and the strengthening of weaknesses that will further bolster the University's national reputation.

By referring to his 14 predecessors, Rogers called upon the traditions of the past and established a framework for the future—a future of rapid, even audacious progress that will, in the 21st Century, elevate the University from its already comfortable position.

Rogers himself occupies a very comfortable position, following in the footsteps of former presidents Gary Sojka and William D. Adams, both of whom set complex strategic plans that ultimately shaped the University's growth. Their lasting effects are still seen today: with increased fundraising, new facilities, and better budget management, the University is financially stronger than ever.

The University has also made huge strides in diversity, gender equity, and advancing the student-athlete model, among other issues, but can still make greater steps forward.

The new president cited the need for a stronger technological presence on campus. He recognizes the value of enrollment management and career development, seeking improvements with the hope of recruiting and maintaining talented students that will ultimately become stronger alumni. He said that we must make better efforts to increase diversity and find harmony with our Lewisburg neighbors.

Rogers said Sunday that "More people need to know us as we know ourselves." In order to make this a reality, the new President and his wife have embarked on the ongoing "Orange and Blue Presidential Tour," enabling the Rogers' to travel to meet various constituencies, and, according to Rogers, "get the word out."

The bus tour will accompany a new but yet undefined marketing strategy aimed at publicizing the University to a national audience. A direct PR campaign should be effective, but will be even stronger when paired with a group of overriding improvements Rogers' Vision entails.

But his vision does not exist without a strong respect for the University's traditions and past. Rogers wants to capitalize on the momentum set by the former presidents although his plans may be ambitious, they are certainly not unrealistic. The Bucknellian applauds the goals of his speech and feels confident in Rogers' capabilities to carry through the detailed and complex blueprint.

The University is in good hands.

Will Foreign Policy impact votes?

By Gretchen Schrock

The debates between the two presidential candidates have recently focused on the maintenance of the Social Security system, the improvement of national educational standards and the controversy of prescription drug coverage included Medicare and other domestic issues, leaving foreign policy on the fringe.

However, a president's foreign policy objectives and views can greatly influence the domestic situation through economic relationships and military interventions. Thus, the important question to ask is, "how do the two candidates contrast in the realm of international policy and who is better qualified?"

Vice President Al Gore is undoubtedly an internationalist and interventionist. He has said that he will use America's military strength to end Bosnia-type massacres, its economic power to persuade failing states to follow the path of democracy and trade agreements to ensure that Western-style labor and environmental standards are adopted.

His ideas and opinions show that he understands that this era of globalization and interconnection demands a foreign policy whose basis is deep involvement in world affairs.

The only problem with his policy proposals is that they ignore the fact that much of the world resents the influential power of United States in all facets of international diplomacy. His solution to this potential problem—"strategic humility."

That phrase is probably completely devoid of meaning like most political campaign phrases, considering that Gore has never elaborated on how it would be incorporated into his interventionist agenda.

Texas Governor George W. Bush also adheres to this "strategic humility" concept. In the second presidential debate, he said, "If we're an arrogant nation, they will resent us. If we're a humble nation, but strong, they'll welcome us." Appearing humble when it is convenient and beneficial, in any context, contributes to a deceitful and two-faced reputation, one that the United States may not want to boast.

In contrast to Gore's international political beliefs, Bush travels the middle road between his party's two competing factions—internationalists who support engagement with great powers like China and isolationists who are wary of the United Nations, the International Monetary Fund and the World Trade Organization.

His argument that America's overextended military should be gradually phased out of the Balkans, which his greater knowledge concerning that particular region compared to any other region.

However, a president must concentrate the majority of his foreign policy attention elsewhere—Asia, the Middle East and the Balkans—places Bush has rarely traveled.

He has traveled to foreign shores only three times—to China where his father was an envoy to Beijing in 1975, to the Gambia where his father was president to lead an American delegation for the country's independence celebration, and to Italy and the Middle East in 1998.

Therefore, with his lack of experience, he formulates his foreign policy by committee and would rather have his group of advisors answer all the questions.

Bush's relative inexperience was highlighted when he joked during the second presidential debate, "I was especially pleased that Mr. Milosevic has stepped down. It's one less polysyllabic name for me to remember." Unfortunately for Bush, being president requires the memorization of the polysyllabic names of many foreign leaders and high-level diplomats.

Which candidate could the United States benefit from, in terms of diplomatic relations? In one week, the citizens of this country will vote for whom they believe is the best man for the job. Hopefully, it will not be the man who has trouble with the pronunciation of "Milosevic."

According to a New York Times article, he "spoke with authority about the differences between the separatist movements in two parts of Indonesia, and discussed what kind of opposition movements in Iraq the United States could exploit to help unseat Saddam Hussein."

This is the result of seven years of intelligence briefings, diplomatic trips and White House meetings, among other things.

Considering Bush's only political experience has been as the Texan governor, his sole foreign focus has been Mexico, where he has traveled frequently. He has promised that he would focus on the present administration, due to Latin America more intensively than the present administration, due to his greater knowledge concerning that particular region compared to any other region.

However, a president must concentrate the majority of his foreign policy attention elsewhere—Asia, the Middle East and the Balkans—places Bush has rarely traveled.

It's one less polysyllabic name for me to remember." Unfortunately for Bush, being president requires the memorization of the polysyllabic names of many foreign leaders and high-level diplomats.

Which candidate could the United States benefit from, in terms of diplomatic relations? In one week, the citizens of this country will vote for whom they believe is the best man for the job. Hopefully, it will not be the man who has trouble with the pronunciation of "Milosevic."

According to a New York Times article, he "spoke with authority about the differences bewould alienate the Europeans, strikes an isolationist tone. He is more tentative about sending American troops abroad in what he calls "nation building," another political phrase lacking a clear meaning.

In addition, Bush's insistence on building a national missile defense system, which would cause opposing Russia and China to increase their nuclear forces in an effort to defeat it, is reminiscent of the Cold War era and would defeat any progress made in international nuclear weapon reduction. It would also eliminate the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, signed by the United States and Russia.

There is also a strong difference in practical experience between the candidates, such that Gore is better suited for the diplomatic role of the president.

In his seven years as vice-president and in many years in the U.S. Senate, Gore has traveled abroad dozens of times and met with various world leaders. "I have seen the world," he said. "I have seen the world."

Rejecting the right to choose between the lesser of two evils

By David McGreevy

I was going to vote this year. Honestly.

I mean, it seems like the thing to do, doesn't it? I do pay taxes, after all, and there's always the chance that, as a healthy young male, I could be sent off to some muddy country to make the world safe, possibly dying in the process.

I really should take advantage of my hard-won political rights and support the candidates who are most opposed to my death (there must be at least a few, if only because most of them haven't met me).

But what can I say... TV was on. Who has time to send in all those applications and stuff when there are quality shows like "Becker" out there?

I should have been writing letters and licking stamps, getting ready to proudly cast my vote in absentia, following in the footsteps of our pioneer ancestors.

I should have been researching the candidates, studying their views on the issues of the day and debating their respective virtues with the gentleness in the square. I should have started a grassroots movement of some kind.

I did none of these things. I did buy a cup of organic coffee, which might count for something, except that I only bought it because I had been up all night watching Canadian educational videos from the 70's on PBS.

Lincoln would understand, I think. They didn't have computer solitaire in his day, and home video selections were limited at best. He would scowl at me, sure, but it would be a loving scowl, after which he would gently touse me and we would run off to play tenpins in the mountains. The adventures we would have, Abe and I. Alas, the politicians of today are not as frolicsome. Still, I have to suspect that they too would not be angry with me for not voting. If I don't speak up about student loans, human rights and not being killed, they can continue to address their campaigns towards the unusual combination of wealthy businessmen and social security recipients.

They take it for granted that, like all the other youth of America, I am apathetic, lazy and generally good for nothing, that I will not stand in the way of their sinister conquests, that they are free to poison the earth, abuse minorities and make soup from the bones of the homeless, all without my interference.

I do not deny any of these charges.

Am I evil for not voting? Well, maybe, yeah. Three years from now, when the cyborgs run amuck and exterminate our once-proud race, please feel free to chastise me for not voting Nader when I had the chance. Because I'll deserve it. But at least for now I'm voting my conscience.

Hear me, o politicians, belway insiders, pundits, sergeants-at-arms, minority whips! I have waived my God-given right to choose the lesser of two evils. You win! Thanks to your fiendishly conceived public schools, I am every bit as apathetic as you hoped. I am a prisoner of my own cynicism, and my brain is so full of old "Simpsons" episodes that I haven't a clue where you stand on immigration.

Arrest me! Tax me! Punish me with crippling student loans! Make my favorite pastimes illegal! Send me off to die for the good of General Motors! Do as thou wilt! Just keep pumping out Mega Man games and please, please, please, don't do anything to "Two Guys and a Girl."

No pesticides are needed when growing hemp, making it ideal for use as a rotational crop. With this lack of chemical use, it can help reduce soil pollution in addition to water and air pollution.

Because of this, many states are considering use of hemp crops under regulation. Currently, Maryland, Hawaii, Minnesota and North Dakota all allow farmers to cultivate hemp through monitored programs.

Hemp is incredibly versatile; it can be used to make both natural and synthetic THC equally illegal. I would like to argue that the value of industrial hemp and hemp products far outweighs any speculative concerns about drug test validity.

Businesses could develop more efficient production and consumers would benefit from a cleaner environment. Furthermore, hemp can be used as an alternative to fossil fuels and natural resources. Hemp oil can actually be used as a substitute for petroleum for plastics. Using hemp fiber in place of pulp can also save trees.

Clearly, hemp can provide numerous resources to better our environment. Surely, I am not suggesting America should jeopardize the accuracy of drug testing in any way. This would be detrimental to society as a whole.

However, the DEA claims im-

Tales from beyond "the bubble"

A student's first-hand account of the political unrest in Israel

By Lauren Gassman

When I was preparing to study abroad for the year at Tel Aviv University in Israel, all my thoughts were filled with what would be in store for me during this coming year. I wondered how much I would learn, grow and change as a result of the culture and society in this country. It never occurred to me to think about what was to come for Israel as a nation during my time here.

Soon after the Camp David talks ended, without a final peace agreement between the Palestinians and the Israelis, I found myself here in Israel. The Israel that I first embraced upon arriving here in August is much different than the one I know today after a month of violence.

During my first two months here, this country was at my fingertips. I traveled throughout the country visiting many different places. Jerusalem, only 40 minutes away, became a place I loved to visit. I had the wonderful experience of staying inside the Old City walls one Shabbat weekend and sharing a Shabbat with an orthodox family.

I also was able to visit the Holocaust Museum in Jerusalem, Yad Vashem. My Israeli cousin took me to the Israel Museum where I was able to see the ancient Dead Sea scrolls. I traveled to Ein Gedi and hiked amongst the waterfalls as well as floated in the famous Dead Sea.

During these first months I came to love Israel as a result of all these adventures. Tel Aviv truly became my home. Taking a bus downtown to explore was a part of my daily routine. I traveled to the shuk, the outdoor market, and shopped amid the pushing and yelling shopkeepers and bargainers that make this place so much fun.

I often found myself at Dizengoff Center at the heart of Tel Aviv, just window-shopping and people watching. I went to a concert at Kikar Rabin and of course often found myself at the beach during the summer, which seemed to last well into October.

The bars, clubs and cafes that make Tel Aviv nightlife the best in Israel also became a part of my life here.

All of this has changed. Ever since Kosh Hashanna, Israel has changed. As I sit here trying to find the words to describe my feelings about the present situation, I find it very difficult to explain to those who are not here.

What I have learned in these days of unrest is that there is a great difference between being scared and being sad. Presently, I am not scared for my personal safety here in Israel.

Although many students in my program have left, I very much want to remain here during these difficult days. As I have explained to numerous concerned family and friends, I am not living in the Israel that you see on CNN. Here in Israel life continues.

At the present time, I am sad for Israel and for the state of the Jewish people who, in the words of the Prime Minister, Ehud Barak, "appear not to have a partner in peace." The pictures and events of the past month are heart wrenching for the entire world.

On October 12th, I, along with two friends, walked along Dizengoff Street shopping and exploring. As we began to descend a flight of stairs, we saw below a crowd of Israelis, young and old, men and women, all gathered around a television. We could not see the images on the TV, but the faces of those Israelis standing there will forever remain etched in my memory.

The pain, sadness and anguish that were evident in the faces of the crowd is something one rarely sees amongst a group of strangers. As we walked closer to the TV, we were confronted with horrifying images of the lynching of the Israeli Reserve soldiers in Ramallah.

Although my Hebrew is far from good, I did not have to understand the words to feel the emotions of that crowd. In Hebrew the word for brother is "Achi" and in the army, the soldiers call each other this as a nickname to show affection.

One of my Israeli friends told me, as we discussed the lynching, that this country is very small—a family—and those soldiers were like everyone's sons, brothers, husbands and fathers.

I no longer take buses here. I no longer go to large public places for fear of terrorist attacks. My time in Israel was not supposed to be like this. When I learned of my friends in France, traveling all over Europe, or my friend in New Zealand, scuba diving and exploring, I felt jealous.

This jealousy quickly faded away. When I chose to come to Israel, I was enthusiastic about embracing all that was Israeli culture and life.

Unfortunately this present wave of violence and unrest is a large part of life in Israel. I may not be learning about this country by traveling and seeing as I had hoped, but I am learning in a vastly different way.

I am learning about the politics of this country to a much greater extent. I find that my Israel Politics class is wonderful. As I read in the daily newspapers about a coalition between the Likud and Labor parties, we are also discussing it in class.

My Zionism class reminds me daily what is the backbone and foundation of this country and why the people must remain strong against its enemies. My classes are coming to life and, subsequently, my understanding of Israel is growing tremendously.

One of my greatest concerns is the media in the United States. There is a popular sentiment in Israel that the media is not illustrating a positive view of Israel.

I would ask anyone who reads or hears something that is anti-Israel, to question all the facts and circumstances of the situation. Israel is truly defending herself at this time.

I ask you to do this not solely for me, as an advocate for Israel, but also as a favor to yourselves in order to fully understand the situation and actions at hand.

Many people have proclaimed that the peace process is over and dead. I still believe that peace will come for Israel. If anything, I see this current wave of violence as a further justification of the importance of peace. Violence can never and will never be the answer.

May we all pray for peace for this country and for the world. Please feel free to email me with your comments or concerns about Israel. My email is legass@aol.com

Using a power outage to its fullest potential

By Kristen Jancuk

This morning, rather than being awakened by the usual cacophony of garbage trucks, lawnmowers, bulldozers and other construction vehicles outside my window, a new sound greeted me: silence. While the early bird construction team was still banging away outside, my room was eerily quiet. The usual hum (or growl) of my computer had stopped. My refrigerator wasn't humming either. What could this be?

A power outage? I consider myself an expert on power outages. If we have so much as a strong wind or a drop of rain, the power goes out in my neighborhood. I think, perhaps, that they actually just shut the power off as a precaution before any big summer thunderstorm. Why delay the inevitable? We've learned to deal with it. We own stock in a candle company.

My house is also prone to power outages when we try to run more than two electrical appliances at a time. During the summer, we just sit and stare at each other, because we cannot watch TV, listen to the radio or cook while the air conditioners are running. It's almost like we're Amish, we just go to bed once it gets dark.

But, a power outage at school is almost like a snow day: it has endless possibilities for fun and free time. Perhaps those of you with reliable electrical systems in your houses aren't aware of all these opportunities, so I will take it upon myself to share them with you.

The most obvious benefit of a power outage is that all electric clocks reset. You wake up and groggily stare at the clock happily blinking 12:00 and wonder what in the world is going on. Don't panic. Roll over and go back to sleep.

Since there was a power outage, completely out of your control, your alarm didn't go off in time for you to go to class. Darn.

Playstation is a no go, so here's your chance to force a "deep and meaningful" conversation and figure out if Mr. Wonderful can actually speak in full sentences.

With these ideas in mind, I hope that the next time you find yourself stuck in a blackout, you will embrace of all the opportunities it provides, rather than throw a temper tantrum because your hair dryer won't work or you forgot to save that Bond game you were in the middle of.

Relationships in college can be confusing and difficult to figure out. Does he really like me, or is he just using me for my CD burner? So, girls, a power outage may be your chance to finally find out if your boyfriend does anything but play video games and drink beer.

The beer will be warm and Playstation is a no go, so here's your chance to force a "deep and meaningful" conversation and figure out if Mr. Wonderful can actually speak in full sentences.

As You Like It: liked by many

By Amy Pelouquin

The As You Like It performance, presented by the Department of Theatre and Dance, would have impressed even Shakespeare himself. This notable performance took place over the weekend at the Harvey M. Powers Theatre in Coleman Hall.

Director Susan Chast added a contemporary twist to the traditional Shakespearean script, which dates back to 1599. This rendition allowed the audience to see the magic capable of being produced by the outstanding ensemble of the cast, artistic sets, and talented choreographers and coaches.

A dazzling cast of actors captivated the audience with their unmistakable on-stage chemistry.

Especially notable was the budding romance between Orlando and Rosalind and the uncharacteristic realistic qualities. The cast perfectly delivered each line in a precise English accent accompanied by equally appropriate body language. The seemingly authentic love story enraptured the audience.

Despite the traditional Shakespearean old English spoken and its tendency to be difficult to understand, the brilliant intonation and accurate body language used by each actor demystified any hidden meanings and humor behind the language.

Speaking of humor, the character of Touchstone, played by Alexander McCausland '02, delivered a comic routine enviable of most of the cast from Saturday Night Live. The combination of his obvious passion for acting coupled with unbridled energy produced a character capable of stealing the entire stage.

"Playing Touchstone was not too much of a stretch for me seeing as how I am a clown at heart," McCausland said.

The play would not have been complete without the aid of the two pages, played by Lacy Gonzalez '04 and Melissa Milanak '03, whose fluid on-stage prancing, and beautiful voices kept the storyline light and romantic among swirls of gauze fabric and bright colors. These two pages worked to evoke a whimsical charm within the play through an infusion of innocent, renaissance-influenced regality. This was a welcome contrast to the brash, humor emanating from the character of Touchstone.

The choreography of each scene was remarkably professional both in its planning and its rendering. Numerous fight scenes were portrayed with striking authenticity and realism. The choreography of a fight scene between Orlando de Boys, played by Jay Klaitz '01, and his brother, Oliver de Boys, played by Brandon Dust '01, was very impressive as the two characters battled it out with moves that would make the stars of WWF jealous.

The audience witnessed a modern, multimedia portrayal of As You Like It. With the added embellishment of visual aids such as video cameras and the innovative use of television sets, the play diligently retained the interest of even the most antsy audience members. Special effects such as slow motion emphasized the impact of fight scenes and monologues.

Through innovative means, the producers and cast of As You Like It succeeded in producing a thoroughly entertaining updated version of a classic play while still retaining the Shakespearean genius behind it.

The extraordinary costumes exhibited an alternative, slightly modern spin to the traditional historical dress of the times. Vivid colors and textures embellished the frame of each costume, and produced intriguing visual masterpieces.

The stage was a fascinating creation with a three-dimensional aspect of the backdrop that prepared for the magical demonstration to take place. An inventive layered effect created the back of the set, with the use of screens and lighting to produce the optical illusion of depth. A sculpted hillside with real logs and branches, and luminous renditions of forest animals, celestial stars and the moon occupied the main stage.

The expert lighting evoked emotion throughout the scenes, and complemented the mood of each successive joy or trauma. The lighting presented a dreamy, utopian ambience at times and an air of violence and imminent danger during the fight scenes.

The ability to improve Shakespeare, the connoisseur of all playwrights, is in itself, incredible. The Department of Theatre and Dance proved themselves worthy of such an accomplishment, as evident to anyone who saw As You Like It this past weekend. I eagerly anticipate their next production, and this is coming from a person formerly not a fan of theatre. I advise you to jump at the opportunity to experience the magic of creative minds.

The evening both began and ended by rewinding back to 1974, the founding year for the Bison Chips.

Veteran Chips arranged themselves chronologically to give the audience a taste of the group's evolution over the last 25 years.

Old time favorites such as "Hooked on a Feeling," "Duke of Earl" and "Under the Boardwalk" showed that the veteran Chips haven't lost any of their sharp harmonies or sense of humor, and a softer "Once Upon a Time" conjured touching reminiscences of time gone by.

A comical stint starring "The Great Zambini" broke up the musical numbers by providing a bit of theatrical magic.

A jazzy rendition of Van Morrison's "Moondance," featuring Williams as the soulful soloist, was a memorable number.

Peter West '93, who met his wife at a Bison Chip's reunion seven years earlier, brought a video camera on stage and had the audience wave hello to his wife, Karen, who could not attend. He then sang "So Much In Love."

Other interesting guests who appeared on stage included President

Stefen Rogers and his wife Athena. The president, who ducked out of his own inaugural ball, and his wife were pleasantly presented with a melodic performance of our "Alma Mater."

As the evening continued, the evolution of the Bison Chips became evident not only in the songs they performed, but also in their style. The early Bison Chips tended to feature a single soloist, while the more modern Bison Chips had many.

After hearing the voices of past Bison Chips, our current Bison Chips took the stage.

In the second half of the show, the audience was treated to more recent favorites such as "Bounce

The Homecoming Comedy Show and Step Performance, presented by Playtime Entertainment and the brothers of Kappa Alpha Psi Incorporated, began a little late but was well worth the wait.

Bucknell students and faculty gathered in the Larison Dining Hall late Saturday night to enjoy the much-anticipated performances. DJ James, the MC treated the audience to hot blends and catchy mixes also heard at both Midnight Madness and the Freshman Formal.

DJ James began by giving the floor to a Penn State guest who amazed the audience with his "beatboxing" talent, a skill that involves mimicking intricate percussions with one's mouth as his only instrument. The guest's beats exactly resembled that of turntables and the like. At one point, he involved DJ James, asking him to act as though he was scratching and spinning as he, the performer, produced the percussion that would accompany such turntable simulations.

Pounding stomps from the ladies of the Jelani Team followed the beatbox performance. Only four ladies performed, but the women of Jelani certainly made themselves heard with complicated step and clap rhythms.

Following the Jelani performance, Nyambi Nyambi '01 performed a synd-up comedy act.

Gerald Kelly, a well-known Def Jam Comedian took over after with another stand-up routine. Kelly's routine, certainly one of the show's highlights, had the crowd hooting and hollering with laughter as he hilariously argued, not that he was racist but that he recognized the differences between black people and white people.

A freestyle rap session delivered by two Penn State guests followed Kelly's act. The show closed with the step performance by the Penn State brothers of Kappa Alpha Psi. The men, sharply dressed in red and black, entered the dimly lit hall and walked down the middle aisle of the floor carrying gifts of red roses for a few lucky ladies in the audience. The men made it down the aisle to the stage where they used canes, claps, and stomps to accompany their bold chants. Then they confidently strutted back down the middle aisle, a nice close to the 2000 Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity Incorporated and Playtime Entertainment Homecoming Comedy Show and Step Performance.

The show was a great success. It not only entertained the crowd, but also raised a lot of money for a good cause. All of the show's proceeds were donated to the Susan Brinkler Breast Cancer Foundation. University students and faculty will most certainly look forward to the 2001 show based on the success of this year's production.

At the very end of the busy homecoming weekend just before Halloween, the Weis Center echoed with the ghoulish screams from Tim Reynolds's guitar. Reynolds, a well-known singer and guitarist, has toured with Dave Matthews three times and has released several CD's, entertaining thousands. This past weekend Reynolds took on and amazed students, faculty, alumni and other fans with his musical talent and mastery of a variety of guitar techniques.

Reynolds has inspired many musicians worldwide.

Peter Prince, another rising singer and guitarist, opened for Reynolds. At exactly 8 p.m., the lights dimmed and Prince came

On the stage.

With his humorous antics, unique sense of style and powerful singing voice, he continuously surprised the audience and prepared them for the excitement of Tim Reynolds.

During his songs, he made comical facial expressions involved the crowd by making jokes. Throughout Prince's performance, students exchanged glances with one another waiting for the moon-belt wearing Prince to make his next move.

"He has the guitar likeness of a young Eric Clapton meeting the vocal styles of the legendary Billy Joel meeting the fashion sense of the astronaut Neil Armstrong," Eric Green '02 said.

After much anticipation, Tim Reynolds finally took the stage around 9 p.m., with his guitar by his side and a Halloween mask shrouding his face. He crept onto the stage and upon yelling "ho," the crowd responded enthusiastically. He proceeded to play his acoustic six-string guitar, one of the two guitars he had with him on stage.

Reynolds began the concert by combining the sounds of his guitar with a special effects board at his feet.

"The harmony of the guitar and the special effects board was phenomenal. He is just an amazing musical artist," Maureen Oscadal '03 said.

Reynolds awed the crowd with his ability to display the full capacity of the guitar throughout his performance. His guitar talent and proficiency with the acoustics board projected a unique and harmonious sound. Eyes closed, Reynolds impressed the audience by playing with both the pick and his fingers. He slowly shook his head to the beat while passionately playing the guitar.

"You know someone is talented when he can sit on the stage for 90 minutes straight, not sing, and still be entertaining," David Reddy, '02 said.

The performance ended with a masked, almost haunted encore: Reynolds finished playing, unplugged his six-string guitar and crept off the stage and with the effects board still vibrating the cryptic music.

Tim Reynolds is currently on a solo acoustic tour this fall. He recently released a new CD, Tim Reynolds Live: Puke Matrix Tour.

Sue Mingus, the widow of Charles Mingus, organized the "Blues and Politics Tour 2000," a politically inspired program of music by her late husband, who was both a composer and bassist. "It's not only timely, but the music is fascinating and exceptional," Bill Boswell, director of cultural events said.

Mingus directed the band, which has released three recordings, two of which have won IN-DE Awards and been nominated for Grammy Awards. The band, which has toured the United States and Europe, also placed first in Downbeat magazine's "Best Big Band" category for two consecutive years.

Mingus discussed her late husband's work in a talk Thursday, October 26, as part of the Weis Center's Prelude! series, which was open to the public without charge.

An Abroad Perspective: A semester in Barbados

By Tovah Lewinter

"Rough life, huh?" That is definitely the most common response I hear when I tell anyone that I spent a semester studying in Barbados. I guess they just picture me lying on the beach, listening to reggae with a tropical drink in hand. So that was once in a while, but what most people do not realize is that it was so much more. I can honestly say that living in Barbados, for five months was the most challenging, educational and enjoyable experience that I have ever had.

While in Barbados, I lived with six other Bucknell students in a beautiful house where we could see the ocean from our windows. We each took two classes at the University of the West Indies, a common class on the culture of Barbados with Professor Daubman and participated in an internship. My internship was working in an elementary school. I had the unique experience of comparing the U.S. and Barbados' education systems.

Whether they were running through the pasture playing football during lunch or touching my hair because they thought it felt like doll hair, the children, clad in their matching uniforms exhibited such spirit, as does the island itself. While I did learn a great deal in my classes and through my internship, I have to say that my most educational experiences resulted more from being submerged in a culture that was completely foreign to me.

Barbados is a unique place with a rich history, stemming from its mix of African and English culture. People in Barbados are very friendly. It is common courtesy to greet everyone you see with a friendly "hello" or a more local "yeah mon" and to give your seat up on a bus to an elderly person or a mother and child. Bajans, natives of Barbados, are also extremely easygoing. At first, I had a hard time adjusting to the laid-back way of life. I was appalled the first time my bus driver stopped in the middle of the road, with a full bus of passengers, to have a 15-minute conversation with a passing friend. But it didn't seem to phase anyone else on the bus. I was worried about being late to my class, but I soon realized that this wasn't an issue since local students would stroll into class anywhere from 10 minutes to an hour late! I don't think Bucknell professors would be as tolerant.

It took a while, but I eventually adjusted to this relaxed mentality. It was such a nice change from the line-oriented lives that we lead here. I learned that faster does not always mean better and that it is important to take time to appreciate the little things in life.

As the cold winter is approaching here in Lewisburg, I long for the days of waking up to the hot sun and warm breeze pouring through my window. The warm climate and the natural beauty of Barbados is absolutely amazing. In a country where the sun shines nearly 365 days a year, it is no wonder that people are generally in such a good mood!

One important lesson that I learned in Barbados was what it is like to be the racial minority. Barbados is 95 percent black, so there were many times that I was the only white person in sight. It was a very new experience for me to constantly be aware of the color of my skin, and while it was extremely uncomfortable at times, it was a learning experience that I will not forget.

What I learned more than anything from my time abroad is what a huge impact culture has on our lives. My time in Barbados opened my eyes to the fact that the "American way" is not always the right way, and that we need to approach other cultures with an open mind.

The more time I spent in Barbados, the more I found myself that the color of my skin made many locals believe that I was a tourist. After living there for a while, you begin to see just how silly the tourists' riding around the island in tour buses and purchasing dreadlock wigs look. By the end of my time there, I felt like a true Barbadian. And while I was excited to see people back home, I wasn't ready to leave.

The majority of experiences that I had in Barbados are impossible to put into words. Some things you have to see to believe—Rastafarian men in woven caps riding bikes down the street on the east coast of the island, just to name a few. I will never forget waking up to the cows mooing in our backyard, the taste of Flying Fish (the national dish), the sound of the Zed-R vans pumping Dub music, meeting people named Coyote and Pac Man, or snorkeling above a coral reef. So while my tan has faded, my memories of Barbados have not. I definitely encourage anyone considering studying abroad to think about spending five months in Barbados, one of the best places on earth.

Sharon's salads a welcome sight for students

By Sarah Gudenkauf

Sharon Meiser is the mastermind behind "Sharon's Salads." It is hard to believe, but before she started working in the Cafeteria at the University she had little experience in food service and had never made salads for a large group of people. This is Sharon's third fall creating her delicious salads.

Everything is made a day in advance. The first thing she does in the morning is to prepare the ingredients for the next day's salad. Over 40 pounds of salad is prepared every day. Then she sets out that day's salad and helps to prepare sandwiches. After lunch is over Sharon is responsible for wrapping up any leftover salad and then for setting out dinner's salad. Sharon is always looking for new salad recipes. She is also very willing to create special salads on request. "Certain students will ask me to make broccoli salad because their moms make it."

Sharon said that she feels like her job gives her a lot of independence. "I've pretty much taken the daily salad and taken it to where it is now. The students come in and they know what I'm going to have."

Sharon thinks that it is important to listen to students and act as a liaison between students and management. Because she interacts with students on a daily basis, she is often asked what she thinks the students want what they like and don't like.

Getting the chance to work with students every day is what drew Sharon to the job at the University. Before coming to the University, Sharon worked in an office. She changed jobs because she had worked alone and wanted to work with people—one of the major reasons she decided to apply to the University.

The students are in fact the reason that Sharon loves her job. "I haven't met one student that I didn't like. The students are great. I love getting to know the students as they go from freshmen to sophomores to juniors to seniors, and really enjoyed seeing the students last year when I worked graduation. It was pretty awesome to see them graduate," Sharon said.

"I think interaction with the students is important; it helps to understand how they feel about being here at school, especially when they come here as freshmen and you can just make them feel welcome."

Sharon can recall two instances that make her job worthwhile. "During Parents' Weekend my first year here, a student came and introduced her parents to me and later her dad came up to me and said, 'It's really nice to meet somebody that you know is taking care of your kid.' And he kissed the top of my head and told me 'keep an eye on her.' Every year they come to Parents' Weekend and they always stop to say hello."

Then Sharon laughed as she remembered, "Another student's parents have a cookie shop and her parents sent me cookies from Texas. It is the little things that make you enjoy your job. And I do enjoy my job here."

Sharon spent her summer expanding her culinary knowledge. She served food at the U.S. Senior Open in June for a week. Two weeks after that, she went to Maryland for a salad maker's conference where she spent three days as a cook. She was happy to do something different.

Sharon's family is extremely important to her. She lives in the nearby town of Sunbury with her two sons, Gary, 17, and Michael, 16. "I'm not only their mom; I'm their best friend, and they can tell me anything."

She also helps out with fund drives for both the American Heart Association and the Diabetes Foundation. Sharon's other major interest is nature.

"I love to be outside, the beach, the ocean. Just the outdoors itself. I think this time of year is beautiful. The trees are wonderful, the colors are beautiful."

People are still what Sharon finds most fascinating. Sharon's love of working with students is always returns to when asked about her job.

"At a school like Bucknell everybody gets to know everybody else. And where I'm from everybody knows everybody else. I've often thought about moving away from here but then I thought I would miss the people. Maybe when my sons graduate and move on then maybe I will move. Go and see more sites, more people. Then I think about leaving here and I think about how much I would miss the students. Like when the football players come in and they have won a game—it's those things that really keep me here."

It is this love of people that makes Sharon a great person to be around. She is a friend, and we hope that she will be around for many years to come, watching many classes of freshmen as they continue on to graduation.

Sharon, a fixture in the Cafeteria, serves with a smile.

A Bucknellian's taste of the Big Apple: New York City

The energy of Central Park enhances an urban oasis

By Katie Hays

Yes, you'll enjoy The Metropolitan Museum of Art and The Cloisters. And you can certainly make the trek to Times Square, dine on penne pasta in a cheap Fifth Avenue side street cafe, or even see a Broadway show. But during your visit to the City, Central Park may intrigue you most.

What other city government attracts jugglers, drug dealers, musicians, and scooter-toting ten-year-olds simply by designating a large green patch of land "public space"? Central Park is where the sane and insane intersect, where baby boomers hurry with hats and handbags, and where dogs compose the vast majority of the animal population.

That's right: dachshunds, chihuahuas, and tiny unidentified rat-like trotters govern the park's pathways. Central Park's dogs are tiny but tough. They aren't surprised by squirrels, cotton candy, or roller blades. Don't expect a friendly yap of acknowledgment; don't seek eye contact. These dogs are street-savvy, jaded and independent.

Yep, they're New Yorkers. And if you're a non-New Yorker, you may be surprised to see a squirrel-sized spiky-furred dog swagger past you with a similar-looking woman. The two will most likely be comfortable, compatible—perhaps engaged in light conversation.

They're New Yorkers and you're in Central Park. In the park on a typical Saturday, Street performers frequent the park, showing off their skills.

A group of actors performs Shakespearean skits: people sit on great boulders, loving like cattle over a hill.

And near the loungers, miniature mechanical sailboats skim the park's largest pond. Mallards and ducks drift about on the water just beyond. The old, the young, and the bright-clothed mill about the park's circumference; this is a place where every language is acceptable—from Chinese to child's laughter.

The airplane curves and forms four letters—an S...an A? "It says 'save,'" the poodle woman says in a cool voice, gazing straight up. (Her dog, silent on the path, looks straight up, too.)

accordian players stand beyond the circle of pond-watchers, playing, appropriately, "I Love New York."

The place resonates—and not just with music. For just beyond a few trees, children swarm over a great dark slide in Wonderland statue; sisters sit side-by-side on toadstools, slapping the March Hare's stone hat and hooting at the Mad Hatter.

People pass without a glance, but I—the tourist—do I stand on the sidewalk amidst the walkers, poodles and vendors as an airplane roars overhead and begins to write letters with its curling smoke.

When Woolf wrote Mrs. Dalloway, did she know that her airplane scene would be unwittingly reenacted on a breezy Saturday in Central Park, the year 2000?

A few people—a woman with her poodle, a man in green spandex, and an elderly woman in bright pink lipstick—pause along the path and look up.

The airplane curves and forms four letters—an S...an A?

"It says 'save,'" the poodle woman says in a cool voice, gazing straight up. (Her dog, silent on the path, looks straight up, too.)

And so, as bagpipers in plaid kilts pass us in a solemn procession, we stare at the sky—the biker in green spandex, the elderly woman with bright pink lipstick, and I.

M...O... is that an N? An F...no...

"That's an E," says the green spandex man.

"It's 'money,'" the pink-lipped woman murmurs.

Save money in New York City? How?

But then it has gone; it is behind the clouds. The letters fade. The people, the music, and the memory remain. As I stand there searching the clouds for the skywriter, I realize that I do not need to spend a cent to enjoy an afternoon in "the Big Apple." Food will come later; for a few hours, before dinner, Broadway and Times Square, a free park reveals more of New York's life and culture than I could hope to find at any of the usual tourist traps.

Here, in Central Park, shouts, saxophonists, and mirrored sunglasses seem inexplicably linked; fall leaves grate against sidewalks; shoes clack and pet owners stroll quickly as the day fades to dusk.

Central Park is not quite a tourist trap, although tourists are quite welcome. It is a place for fairy-tale statues, for squinting at skywriters, and for New Yorkers seeking solace on sunny Saturdays—and their little dogs, too.

The Metropolitan Museum of Art's little known sibling

By Jolene Hart

16 Tourists wanting a break from the bustle of Central Park and Times Square do have other options. The Cloisters museum provides you with a quiet getaway—a glimpse into a medieval monastery.

17 Squirrelled away on four acres of beautiful green space on Manhattan's Upper East Side, the Cloisters' architecture incorporates five authentic cloisters from France, dating back to the 13th century. Its covered walkways link more contemporary galleries of the museum, just as they joined areas of a monastery over 800 years ago.

When you arrive, you'll follow a winding cobblestone path to the museum's entrance. You pass under the first cloister, leading into the entranceway, which connects several Gothic-style stone arches.

Inside The Cloisters, lofty ceilings and stone walls characterize the rooms. While passing through the galleries, you can almost hear the echoing tones of a Gregorian chant or see a group of monks shuffling by, heads bowed in prayer.

The Cloisters hosts artifacts from as early as A.D. 800, though its emphasis lies in the 12th through 15th centuries. Medieval European paintings and sculptures, vivid stained glass, illuminated manuscripts and stunning tapestries comprise the majority of the museum's collection.

The most celebrated pieces of art attributed to The Cloisters are the seven tapestries, which together form the story of a unicorn's capture. The tapestries, collectively entitled "The Hunt for the Unicorn," were woven in Brussels in 1500 and remain in flawless condition. These works were contributed from the personal collection of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., the philanthropist who provided for the museum's establishment in 1925.

Each tapestry stretches almost the entire length of floor to ceiling, and is hung in a room meant to appear as the great hall of a castle. The rich colors and intense emotions captured in each piece could captivate a visitor for hours.

In an adjoining room, stairs lead into a stunning Gothic chapel, distinguished by its towering stained glass windows and typical gothic architecture. The sun, gleaming through the panes, dramatizes the life-sized statues of saints, found in Spain and Italy in the 14th and 15th centuries.

In another area of the museum, a similar Romanesque chapel displays a fresco of the Virgin and Child. Other attractions to The Cloisters include a splinter of wood said to belong to the original crucifix, and the Chalice of Antioch, said to be Christ's cup during the Last Supper. (Though there are no real answers as to the origin of these objects, their history as sacred piec-

A Subway Slam

Dan Blair—The Bucknellian

By Andres Soltren

The first Subway Series in 44 years crashed into New York two weeks ago.

The 7 train goes to Shea and the 4 to the Bronx. These two subways take New Yorkers to their respective stadiums.

During a trip to New York, one could see flags hanging on the lamp-posts, signs in front of bars, diners, street vendors and even churches, all proclaiming loyalty to a team.

The usual bustle around New York City was increased because of the drama occurring in the ballparks. The buzz was tangible, especially late at game time.

The news channels in New York start and finish with tales from the Series: they recap the game, they tell stories of fans gathering in restaurants and sports bars to watch the game, they tell stories of couples getting married or baptizing their children on the eve of the opening game.

The 7 to Shea. The 4 to the Bronx. Pledge your allegiance! New York already has.

Times Square at the heart of NY

By Sandi-Jo Galati

We, along with 500 million others worldwide, have all rung in the New Year with Dick Clark, and—with the exception of the luminous falling ball—an average day in Times Square is no less exciting.

Twenty-six million tourists visit Times Square annually. Named after The New York Times, Times Square stretches from West 40th Street to West 53rd Street, to both sides of Eighth Avenue and to Ninth Avenue on West 46th Street. Coincidentally, its shape is that of two triangles, rather than a square.

During a visit here, one will join packs of tourists and natives crowding the sidewalks, where a quick pace, a chorus of music, honking car horns and over-zealous street vendors guide you to your destination.

Featuring 251 restaurants, ranging from established chains such as Hard Rock Cafe and Planet Hollywood to gourmet delis and restaurants serving foods that reflect all ethnicities, Times Square will satisfy any Bucknellian's appetite.

Establishments such as ESPN Zone and the WVF Entertainment Complex offer dinner and entertainment until the wee hours of the morning in a nightclub environment. If your intention is shopping, The Disney Store, The Warner Bros. Studio Store, The Gap and Virgin Records are intermingled with hundreds of smaller stores, offering anything and everything from computers to novelties.

Entertainment in New York is synonymous with Broadway plays, all 22 of which are performed near Times Square. Finding a convenient movie time is a simple task when there are 16 cinemas airing motion pictures on 40 different screens.

If you are more intent on a hands-on experience, thrill-seekers can choose between the Bar Code Galactic Circus—a 20,000 square-foot electronic entertainment complex—or the FunTower—a 24-hour amusement skyscraper, equipped with arcades, virtual reality games, a haunted-house and additional ever-changing diversions from the real world.

MTV Studios is another popular gathering place for music video lovers and Carson Daly fans, all hoping to claim a few seconds of national broadcast time on "Total Request Live."

Concerned about the effects of the Bucknell Bubble? If this is the case, a trip to Times Square is the best thing since the ticker on Instant Messenger.

It's rumored that a hot dog or hot pretzel tastes even better while watching current events on the famous Jumbotron on Times Tower, the Sony Video screen or NBC Astrovision. In addition, check your stock investments on the Dow Jones Zipper or at the NASDAQ's new Market Site. New additions such as Madame Tussaud's New York, a world renowned wax museum set to open in November, two five-star hotels and an additional 20,000 square feet currently being added to The Gap, provide the assurance that the entertaining distinction Times Square enjoyed throughout the 20th century will continue into the 21st.

At the cross of the X would be the Olympic Village, on the East River across from the United Nations. The athletes would be housed there and would have easy access to rail lines into Manhattan and ferry lines to the Hudson and the East Rivers. On both, athletes would use private vehicles to get them to where they need to be.

The possibility of an Olympics in New York sounds intriguing but can it truly happen successfully and safely? This is precisely the question the U.S. Olympic Committee will be asking itself when it selects the U.S. which will go and compete with the rest of the world. NYC2012 has high hopes that its proposal will turn heads and create believers out of skeptics. And if the last few weeks have any bearing on the bid, New York sure loves its sports.

'Big Kick' in gear to raise funds

Trish Armstrong '01 chairs Senior Gift Drive allowing students to aid school

Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

By Katie Heise and Katie Hays

The "Big Kick" is in progress. Signs advocating the Senior Gift Drive sit atop the tables in the Cafeteria and grace the walls of the Langone Center, yet it remains a mystery to many students. What exactly is this gift drive?

Senior political science major Trish Armstrong, chair of this year's Senior Gift Drive Steering Committee, explained that the aim of the "Big Kick" is to collect as many donations to the University as possible from seniors within a two-week period. The committee will then base its efforts for the remainder of the year upon the gifts received.

Students may earmark their donations for certain campus organizations, academic departments and sports. This method was designed to inspire more interest among seniors and afford them a chance to directly give back to the programs that have influenced them.

As Armstrong explained, "One cool aspect of the Senior Gift Drive is that you can give your money to a specific group: RHA, a professor conducting research, the English department. Many students really like this opportunity to help a University group that they're involved in."

"This way is more appealing because people can allocate their donations to specific areas on campus that interest them."

—Trish Armstrong

"A lot of people aren't into donations. This way is more appealing because people can allocate their donations to specific areas on campus that interest them."

Gifts do not have to be large; the average pledge is between $25 and $50. All amounts are welcome and, as an added incentive, seniors pledging $25 or more will receive a t-shirt.

Another facet of the gift drive is the Par-tend to show support for their favorite academic or athletic activities.

The drive was instituted by University Relations to promote gift-giving before students leave the University. Those who donate early tend to continue to do so in the years to come. "It's important to spark student interest," Armstrong said.

"We've had a lot of opportunities at the University, and now, for the first time, we have a chance to give back, to leave things potentially better than we found them." So, let's give a rousing "Ray" for Bucknell spirit and keep those pledges rolling in.

Wink Thinks

Dear Wink,

I recently picked up this new girl, whom I happen to really like. She is cool as hell, and is especially easygoing; something I really like because of my own laid back style. The thing that surprised me was that after we collided she didn't say "watch where you are going," but rather jokingly asked me if it was as good for me as it was for her.

Now what other girl that you know would say that?

I must say that there has been one thing that has happened in the past few weeks that has annoyed me a little bit. You see, she tends to stop over every night she shows up, I mean it does have its benefits, but sleeping over every night? Don't get me wrong I like sleeping with her, but it's getting ridiculous.

My bed is small enough for one person. She wants to talk before we go to bed. I know its bad, but I feel like I just want to sleep by myself sometimes, and not simply because her breath stinks in the morning. So I ask you, how do I get her to sleep in her own room sometimes, as well as leave me alone when I am trying to sleep?

Sincerely,
Morning Breath Mishap

Dear Morning Breath Mishap, I am sorry to hear that your girl's breath smells so bad. I have shivers just thinking about it. Maybe you could buy her a bottle of Scope or something. But some people just have chronic bad breath. What do you do if this happens to be the case, you may ask?

Personally, I don't see what all your crying is about with your girlfriend sleeping over. Let me ask you something—would you rather she slept in her own room all of the time? You can't have it both ways. I honestly don't have much sympathy for someone who is whining about the fact that his girlfriend sleeps over. Also, I don't see the whole problem with the bed is not being big enough.

Now, you also spoke of the fact that your girlfriend likes to talk to you when you are trying to sleep. I don't really know what to say about the talking thing except to ask her to be quiet. I must say I do sympathize with you if she is a talker. Let me give everyone a little clue—when you turn the lights off and you are lying in your bed you are supposed to go to sleep. Some people don't say a word when the light is on, but as soon as the light goes off they suddenly just start to chatter. Do you have something better to do after you are with your girlfriend? Are you suddenly thinking that you have to wash my car? What do you want to do-get up and do jumping jacks? I know that you don't have anything better to do, so just sit tight and be "the man." Play it cool, bro, and everything else is in the bag.

To sum everything up here, all I have to say is not to complain about trivial things. Life is not perfect, and most people are not either. So deal with the bad breath and the talkers, and learn to enjoy yourself.

Students help local children

By Gretchen Schrock

Despite the cold temperatures and stinging wind early Saturday morning, numerous University student organizations participated in the annual Children's Festival in Hufnagle Park in downtown Lewisburg. The Bucknell Community Service Team and the Office of Alumni, Parents and Volunteers hosted the event.

Each organization set up a booth where they provided games and crafts for the children of Lewisburg, who were dressed up in their finest Halloween attire. The organizations represented were the Social Justice Residential College, Hillel, German Club, Society of Women Engineers, Alpha Chi Omega, Phi Kappa Psi, Bucknell Student Government, Class of 2003, PSEA and Sigma Alpha Epsilon.

Mask making, face painting, a bean bag toss and a fishing game were a few of the activities in which the children could participate. At the Sigma Alpha Epsilon booth, the kids could win goldfish as their prize, while at the Alpha Chi Omega table, various types of cookies could be decorated.

There was also a Halloween parade, where the children could show off their costumes. Making their appearance in the parade were a lion, a bee, a cowboy, Snow White, Dorothy from the Wizard of Oz, cows, a few medieval princesses and some soldiers. The Bucknell Homecoming Hosts and Hostesses, who were having fun playing with the kids, were also in attendance. For the parents, children, volunteers and everyone else involved, it was definitely an enjoyable time.

Students create masterpieces at Craft Center

By Shannon Lack

The University Craft Center is located in the rear of the Seventh Street Café and provides students, staff and the surrounding community with a wide range of crafts that are geared towards the casual and serious artists.

As you walk in, you're immediately immersed in the relaxing smell of melting candle wax. In the rear of the room, two students work below a sign stating directions on how to create your own candle.

They are in the process of melting wax and choosing their scent. To their right sit two pottery wheels and a cupboard full of over 20,000 beads. These are just a few of the ways to take advantage of the relaxed setting of the Craft Center and all of its creative opportunities.

Ceramics, jewelry, stained glass, painting, knitting, candle-making and silkscreening compose a small portion of the list of activities available in the Craft Center. All the prices are extremely reasonable and most candles fall within the $2 to $3 range while clay is only $1.60 a pound. Specific craft discipline sessions often cost around $20 to $50 and run four to six weeks.

There are numerous activities to choose from, whether or not you are looking to participate in a particular session or create on your own.

The Craft Center carries an abundance of supplies and all of the crafts are created "in house." There are work areas for ceramics, metal making (jewelry) and candlemaking. Located throughout the room are an abundance of supply closets containing anything from screwdrivers, leather and woodworking tools and stained glass supplies to lapidary stones.

There are white bins full of dye to be used for tie dying and silkscreening. All of these crafts are available for the student as long as the Craft Center is open whether they're beginners or experienced artists.

The Craft Center also has a full kitchen it is planning on utilizing during the spring semester.

Gretchen Heuges is the new coordinator of the Craft Center. She has an extensive background in the Arts and is very excited about the prospects of the Craft Center. Gretchen schedules a variety of creative sessions where everyone is invited to come and learn a specific craft.

At present the Craft Center is offering ceramics, knitting, mosaic and scarf-making sessions. Gretchen has her eyes on the future—she is already planning new sessions for the spring semester as our fall semester is winding down.

Skilled instructors head the sessions and provide students with an opportunity to learn a specific craft for a reasonable fee. Heuges has also taken into consideration the fact that students are very busy and is planning on offering one-day sessions in areas such as candlemaking. This will provide the student with enough background to come in and continue the craft in their free time.

She plans on letting the student body know of these sessions through email as well as campus mail. One new idea she is incorporating is a cooking session. In fact, she already has someone interested in instructing a pasta making class.

Heuges is mainly interested in opening up the Craft Center to all students on campus. She does not want anyone to think that it is only for art majors or artists. The Craft Center is open to all and is very accessible from 11 a.m. to 10 p.m. Mondays through Thursdays, noon to 6 p.m. Fridays and noon to 5 p.m. Saturdays.

Heuges' latest project involved sending out a student survey for feedback on what students would like to see happen at the Craft Center.

Student input happens to be her main focus as the new coordinator. She realizes that she has to make the student body more aware and then provide students with the crafts that interest them. She was surprised to discover that many students didn't even know the Craft Center existed.

Heuges is very excited about the prospects of the Craft Center in general. "The Craft Center is International space station crew launched

By Matthew Trunnell

A new chapter in human spaceflight began Tuesday with the launch of the first permanent residents of space. The crew of the Expedition One will be the first to inhabit the much-anticipated International Space Station (ISS).

Living in space has been a human dream at least since the space age began, and that dream is slowly becoming reality.

"I'd say there's a decent chance that Oct. 30 may be the last day we don't have humans in space," station flight director John Curry said at NASA's Johnson Space Flight Center in Houston.

Early in the morning hours of Oct. 31, one American and two Russian astronauts departed from the Baikonur Cosmodrome the same launch pad Yuri Gagarin, the first human in space, took off from almost forty years ago. The three-member crew plans to dock with the space station at 4:20 a.m. EST today.

Expedition Commander Bill Shepard, Soyuz Commander Yuri Gidzenko and Flight Engineer Sergei Krikalev will stay aboard the ISS for four months, until another crew replaces them. Astronauts from the 16 participating countries will man the station over its expected lifetime, which should be at least 15 years.

The ISS is the largest peacetime international cooperation project in history, with an estimated cost of over $60 billion. It will take forty more launches to complete the construction of the ISS in 2006. Today, two years after the first module was launched, the station is still in its infancy with only three modules currently assembled in orbit.

One of the first tasks of the Expedition crew will be to unpack new equipment and bring final life-support systems online, including devices that purify the air and provide drinking water. There is not enough electricity yet to power the main oxygen generators, so the crew will use special oxygen-generating "candles" until the next supply flight brings an oxygen tank. In January, additional solar arrays will be installed that will provide enough power for the completed station.

While setting up the complex over the next four months, the crew will host three shuttle visits—the first to install the power-generating solar arrays, the second to attach the US-made scientific laboratory Destiny, and the third to bring experiments to the new laboratory, according to NASA.

New experiments are ultimately the reason for building the space station. The near-zero-gravity environment of the station is the main attraction to scientists. Just as controlling temperature and pressure were at the center of revolutionary 19th century discoveries like steam power, controlling gravity is expected to yield a new wave of discoveries about how our universe is put together.

Other early research interests include fundamental biology, fluid physics, and material science. Researchers hope to explain and counteract the long-term effects of weightlessness on the human body, a topic essential to future manned missions to Mars.

One of the first experiments, designed by MIT associate professor David Miller, tests new ways of dampening vibrations in components that operate space-based telescopes, like the Hubble. When the Space Shuttle was the only platform for microgravity experiments, orbiting only two weeks at a time, it took up to six weeks to get results. Using the station, "that's now cut to a week," Miller said.

By the time ISS is in its twilight years, it is likely that NASA, teamed with crucial support from the international community, will be preparing for manned missions to Mars, or maybe we will already have been to Mars and back. Considering that our first journey into space began only 37 years ago, a trip to Mars may seem trivial compared to where humans may go in the 21st century.

A video still taken from the Space Shuttle Discover shows the Z1 truss structure of the International Space Station as it overlooks Earth on the sixth day of its flight.

Creatures of the fourth dimension

By Cheryl Myers

Human beings are indeed creatures of habit. If we all sat down and thought about everything we do during the course of a day, it would be evident that each of us have patterns and routines that we generally follow. Much like certain plants have their own timing mechanisms that allow them to open and close their blooms, the National Science Foundation (NSF) reported that we humans also have our own personalized internal clocks composed of circadian rhythms.

According to Educational Leadership, the Mayo Clinic has compiled a list of over 100 circadian rhythms that recur about every 24 hours. A major circadian rhythm is the sleeping-waking pattern, but there are many others including respiration rate, body temperature, eating/snacking schedules, work breaks and peak physical and mental periods. All of these rhythms are intertwined in our daily living, and are affected by environmental factors called zeitgebers.

Zeitgebers can include a number of stimuli such as a work or school schedule or caffeine intake, and they can either support or oppose the timing of your circadian rhythms. The Center for Biological Timing of the NSF researches this "human clock" and has its control center located in a group of cells found within the hypothalamus of the brain. Information about day length is received from the retina of the eye and interpreted in the hypothalamus. The hormone melatonin is then released on a schedule based on the 24-hour day length. During the night, melatonin secretion rises, while daylight slows down its release.

Once a pattern is established, melatonin is secreted in a cycle regardless of the cues received from light. The hypothalamus also triggers a response by the pituitary gland, also found in the brain, stimulating a release of hormones that affects a variety of areas of the body including the endocrine, immune, cardiovascular and urinary systems of the body.

Because of our necessity to have a routine, problems arise when our circadian rhythms become disrupted. According to the NSF, our bodies must reorient themselves when our carefully adapted patterns are knocked out of synchrony, and minor time change and must be reset. However, some rhythms adapt more easily to new time zones than do others. Temperature may have been altered for the new time zone, while sleep still remains matched with the previous time zone.

Circadian rhythms have an enormous impact on all aspects of our lives. It is a well-known fact that different people have rhythms adapted to different periods of the day. We label a person a "morning person" or "night person" according to the time of day when that person feels most awake and energetic. According to the Association of Operating Room Nurses (AORN) Journal, our circadian rhythms are set at birth and despite that we can adjust our internal clocks to fit our schedules, our circadian rhythms will revert to their natural state given the opportunity.

Dr. Mary Carskadon reported to CNN that teenagers and people in their early 20s usually wake up and fall asleep later than do adults and often feel more tired during the day even after a full night of rest. Due to these types of studies, many researchers are advising schools to develop schedules that are in sync with their students' biological clocks.

"We, as a society, are asking them [students] to sleep at the wrong time," said Carskadon. "This can put their circadian rhythm, or biological clock, in conflict with the school bell."

Because of the influence circadian rhythms have on us, time is truly of the essence. Peak performance at work or school requires us to know how our bodies prefer to function and to cater as well as we can to our pre-programmed internal clocks.

Interested in operating your own business someday?

By Tara Zack

Do you want to be your own boss? Ever wondered what exactly it takes to start your own business? One of the little known resources on this campus is the Small Business Development Center.

The SBDC provides information on many topics of interest to those who are starting their own businesses, including the following:

- Initial business establishment (product feasibility and marketing location)
- Business plans, patent searches, and trademarks
- Insurance coverage, regulations, and taxation

The SBDC also hosts seminars to cover these and many other business-related topics. The next seminar is at 1:30 p.m. Nov. 8 in the business office. The PDC helps inventors further develop product design, produce drawings on ProEngineer and even construct prototypes. To better assist clients the SBDC utilizes many of the resources available in Dana Engineering and employs management and engineering student interns.

Longene Center room 241C. Anyone interested is invited to attend and asked to pre-register at http://www.departments.bucknell.edu/sbdc/form_seminar.html.

Proof of "gas chambers?"

Original photo published in The Auschwitz Album (New York: Random House, 1981), p. 126 (photo 183). It shows Hungarian Jews shortly after their arrival at Auschwitz. They appear to be relaxed.

Falsified Photo. In 1997 the Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC) posted the same photo on its Website captioned: "As these prisoners were being processed for slave labor, many of their friends and families were being gassed and burned in the ovens in the crematoria. The smoke can be seen in the background." It is dated "June 0, [sic] 1944."

The smoke is faked. It's been airbrushed in. There is no smoke to be seen in any Allied photo taken of Auschwitz and Birkenau during 1944. It is well known that crematoria do not emit such smoke. In this ludicrous and fraudulent artwork the "smoke" appears to be coming from a fence post.

After this fakery was exposed on the World Wide Web, the SWC cut the ONE LINE in its caption referring to "smoke." The SWC left the photo, however, to exploit the all too vivid imaginations of students and journalists [see: <http://motic.wiesenthal.com/gallery/pg22/pg00/pg22035.html>].

This is one among scores of instances [see www.codoh.org] where those representing the Holocaust Industry have used faked photos, faked captions, and faked sources for photos to "prove" the unique monstrosity of Germans.

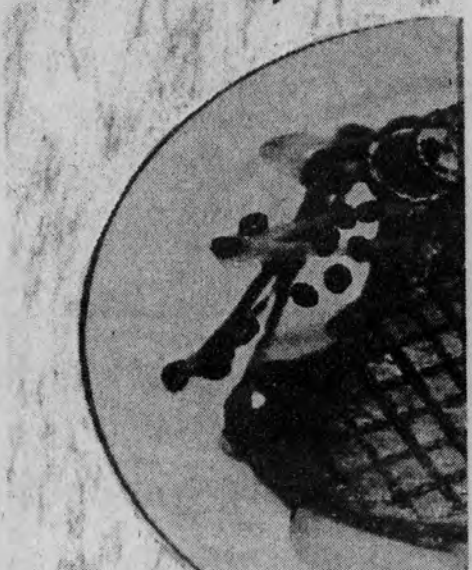

Why does the OUTRAGEOUSLY PROFITABLE Holocaust Industry continually falsify World War II incidents to supposedly "prove" that for which it claims to have "tons" of evidence?

The world awaits proof (real proof) that during World War II the Germans gassed ONE human being as part of a program of ethnic genocide. For a fresh insight to these issues, see David Irving's brilliant and courageous closing statement to the British High Court at: www.codoh.com.

Bison down Navy; advance to Patriots

Tim Choate—The Bucknellian

Chris Beckman '04 and the Bison can host the tournament with a win.

By Katie Yingling

The Bison are on fire, and nothing seems to be able to stand in their way. Under the leadership of its five graduating seniors, the men's soccer team has done a 180-degree turnaround since the seniors first entered the program four years ago.

The Bison seniors, who lead what could easily be considered the most talented team in the league, are sitting not only before Bucknell's first appearance in the Patriot League Tournament in seven years, but also before the first opportunity to host the tournament in ten years.

This is the result of Bucknell's 2-1 overtime victory against Navy this past weekend. The Midshipmen scored just 15 minutes into the game when Navy's Nick Huber headed the ball into the goal off of a corner kick. The Bison were quick to respond, placing the ball into the net just 12 minutes later. Junior Andrew Aurand claimed the goal as his fourth of the year.

Although the Bison dominated shots throughout the second half of the game, they could not seem to find the back of the net. Navy nearly ended the contest in regulation on a shot with three seconds left, but Aurand came through for the Bison once again, stopping the ball on the goal line and sending the game into the extra session.

Ninety-minutes into play, Bucknell faced its eighth overtime game of the year, but Head Coach Brendan Nash saw no reason to worry.

"Overtime is something our guys have confidence in," Nash said. "We do a lot of conditioning in practice and we call it overtime. Once we get into the extra session, we don't fear skipping a beat because of fatigue."

The Bison dominated the overtime outshooting Navy 3-0. Just seven minutes into the third frame, senior Geza Lendvai Lintner was able to head the ball off of Bucknell's third corner kick into the lower right corner of the goal, clinching a victory for the Bison and their first berth in the Patriot League Tournament in seven years. The goal was Lendvai-Lintner's third game-winner of the season.

"Things have really come together," senior Sam Graziano said regarding both the win over Navy and the season in general. "We have proven that, when we're at our best, we can beat any caliber of team out there."

While the win over Navy has promised the Bison a seed in the tournament, regular season Patriot League play is not over yet. "Navy has put us into the tournament," Graziano said. "But by claiming either a win or a tie over Lehigh this weekend, we could host the tournament right here at home and we are very excited about that possibility."

The Bison travel to Lehigh on Sunday and have the opportunity to return to Lewisburg sitting on top of the League. If so, Bucknell would host the Patriot League Tournament on Nov. 11-12.

With the hard work and dedication of the men's soccer team, the leadership of the five seniors, we shouldn't expect anything less.

By Jennifer Cruickshank

After a 4-2 loss at Georgetown last Saturday, the Bison field hockey squad sets its sights on a greater goal—the Patriot League Tournament. The Georgetown game marked the end of the regular season for the Bison, in which they finished 8-10 overall.

The Hoyas jumped out to a first half 2-0 lead and Bucknell was unable to make up the difference. Early in the second half, Georgetown increased their lead to 4-0, but the Bison would not accept a shutout.

time the Bison have made it to the Tournament in the last six years.

The third seeded Bison will face second seeded Fairfield in a rematch of the 3-2 Bison victory over the Stags late in the regular season.

Bucknell stands at 3-3 in the Patriot League and has already beaten two of the three teams participating in the Tournament. The Bison lost a nail-biter to Lafayette in the championship game last season, but they are confident that this year is their year.

unassisted goal with less than two minutes remaining to play.

The late Bison tallies were too little, too late. "I think we were kind of just going through the motions at Georgetown," Higgs said. "This weekend will be completely different."

This Friday afternoon, the Orange and Blue will make its third consecutive appearance in the Patriot League Tournament, held this year at Holy Cross.

claims Patriot

Although this past weekend was Homecoming on the Bucknell campus, the men's and women's cross country teams traveled to Lehigh for a homecoming of their own, trying to defend their titles at the Patriot League Championships.

The women's team was successful at defending its league title for the third consecutive year, winning the race on the strength of all five scoring runners finishing in the top-ten. However, the men's team came up just short of capturing its fourth straight title, finishing second to rival Army, who took the first four places in the 8,000-meter race.

In the women's race, junior Becki Marshall '02 led the pack, successfully defending her individual title in a time of 21:15.3. Marshall was followed by teammates Andrea Beisser '03 and Theresa Dennis '03, finishing in second and third in times of 21:37.2 and 21:38.3, respectively.

Bucknell's remaining top ten finishers were Christina Crowe '02 and senior Mandy Yournell '01, finishing sixth and ninth in times of 22:00.8 and 22:31.9, respectively. All five of these individuals garnered All-League status for finishing in the top-ten.

Head coach Art Gulden was pleased that the squad's hard work was rewarded. "I am very happy with the ladies' performance, and of course the third consecutive Patriot League title," Gulden said.

Marshall was also impressed with the team's ability to deal with adversity, bouncing back after a discouraging performance at the Pre-NCAA meet in Ames, Iowa on Sept. 29.

"We didn't run as well as we would have liked in Iowa, but everyone was able to put that slight disappointment behind them and give their best performances of the year," Marshall said.

On the men's side, three individuals finished in the top-ten, earning themselves All-League honors. Sophomore Greg Costello set the pace for the Orange and Blue, finishing in fifth place with a time of 25:13.0. The other two athletes finishing in the top-ten were seniors Kevin Weatherhill and Brad Wertz, crossing the finish line in eighth (25:16.4) and ninth place (25:18.9), respectively.

But Gulden was disappointed in the second-place finish, and its inability to stay with Army down the stretch.

"Army really put it to us at the three mile point in the men's race," Gulden said. "They have a good team, but were only eight seconds ahead of Wertz [at the three mile point], which means our team was not as tough as theirs."

Both teams are currently preparing for the NCAA Mid-Atlantic Regional Championships, being held on the campus of Penn State on Sat., Nov. 11.

Fickle finger of fate in the NFL

Ravens' strong start falters as the Steelers pick up momentum

By Rob Schmirer

Professional football is a strange game. Only in the NFL can fortunes change so quickly.

For the Pittsburgh Steelers, who started 0-3, things seemed as if they couldn't be any worse. The opposite was true of division rival Baltimore, who started off 5-1, including two wins against defending division champ Jacksonville. But only a few weeks later, their fortunes have turned and the Ravens are heading in the wrong direction.

In week one, Baltimore shut out Pittsburgh 16-0, the first of three losses to start the season for Pittsburgh. During their slump, they looked mediocre at best with QB Kent Graham throwing zero touchdowns. Since then, the Steelers have won five in a row and now sit in second place in the AFC Central with a 5-3 record. During their winning streak, they have given up an average of five points per game.

The offense, although still not terribly good, has scored enough points (18 per game) to put the Steelers in the win column every week since. Jerome Bettis has rejuvenated his game and is tied for second in the conference with six touchdowns while recording five 100-yard games. Bettis has made up for the QB duo of Graham and Kordell Stewart, who have thrown for a combined total of three touchdowns all year. Eventually Graham and Stewart are going to have to put some points on the board because Bettis and their third ranked defense can't carry them all year long. But honestly, how many people really think Kordell can lead this team to the Super Bowl?

Scoring points is exactly what is going wrong for Baltimore. The Ravens haven't seen the end zone in five straight games, with kicker Matt

Stover scoring the last 46 points of their season. It doesn't take a rocket scientist to realize that this isn't the way to win games. Like the Steelers, the Ravens have recorded two straight shutouts this year and are ranked third overall on defense.

While only giving up 11 points per game during their three game losing streak, they have only scored an average of five. Baltimore should and could have easily gone 3-0 in those games, but their offense has been absolutely horrible. Included in their losing streak was a loss to Pittsburgh last week 9-6. While the Steelers only have three passing touchdowns, Baltimore has scored a total of two rushing touchdowns all year. In week one, Priest Holmes ran for 119 yards, but then lost his starting job after week three. Rookie Jamal Lewis ran for 116 yards in week four, and on the year has outgained Holmes 530-399. The solution seems simple: give one of them the ball, not both. They are both capable of putting up big numbers, but both have different running styles. They should focus on getting one of them the ball so the offense can gain some consistency.

As for the rest of the season, Baltimore will look to rebound and gain some momentum before the playoffs. They have two straight games against Cincinnati and Cleveland who are a combined 4-14 on the year. This would be a perfect time for their struggling offense to regain rhythm and confidence.

If Tony Banks and Trent Diller can't get the job done, I say bring in rookie Chris Redmond and give him a shot. As for Pittsburgh, the Steelers have a test this weekend against the Titans, many who think is the best team in the AFC. We'll all find out if Pittsburgh is for real or not.

Over in the NFC, Tampa Bay, who once was thought to be a contender for the Super Bowl has had an up and down season. Like Baltimore and Pittsburgh, their defense has kept them in many games while second year QB Shaun King continues to mature. After winning three straight to start of the year, Tampa dropped four in a row.

Knowing that another loss would be disastrous, the Bucs welcomed the Vikings to town over the weekend. Or should I say, the unbeaten Minnesota Vikings. The question heading into the game was which Bucs team would show up, Jekyll or Hyde? Luckily for Tampa Bay, it was the right one, as the Bucs embarrassed Minnesota 41-13, on Shaun King's four touchdown passes. This alone may give them enough confidence to make a run at the title, even after losing four in a row.

So what does the future hold for these teams? Only the football gods know who will be still standing at the end of the season, but I can say with total confidence that it won't be a team with a mediocre offense. While a defense will win a few games, these teams do indeed need help to win the title. Tampa Bay found that out last year and acquired Keyshawn Johnson during the offseason to add some firepower. Baltimore and Pittsburgh are going to be forced to find that someone who will produce for them. Until then, don't expect to see them in the Super Bowl.

2000 NHL season underway

By Kevin Logan

It was a very disappointing play-off for St. Louis fans last year; not too long ago, they were looking on in disbelief as their league-leading Blues were eliminated by an eighth-seeded San Jose Sharks team in the first round. But as the new NHL season hits the one-month mark, it seems the Blues have bounced back.

Through 11 games of play during the month of October, they've found themselves having their best ever start in the franchise's 33-year history. Sunday night's triumph over the Carolina Hurricanes marked their fifth consecutive win, improving them to 8-2-1 for the season. And when they score first?

Well, let's just say you don't want to be in the other team's skates. Thus far, no team has been able to come back after giving up the first goal to St. Louis.

The Blues may have some stiff competition in the Western Conference this season, especially in their Northwest Division rivals, the Colorado Avalanche. The Avs, backed by the now all-time winningest goalkeeper Patrick Roy, remain the only undefeated team in the league at 9-0-2.

Meanwhile, over in the Pacific Division, the Coyotes have jumped out to first place with an 8-1-2 record thus far, led by Jeremy Roenick's 16 points. Moving East, the Ottawa Senators are the team to catch right now, sitting atop the conference with a 6-1-3 record. Had it not been for a game against the Florida Panthers on Saturday, the Sens may have still been partners in crime with Colorado in the undefeated category.

But that was not the case, and they suffered their first loss to Florida at National Car Rental Center, thanks to a second-period game-winning, short-handed goal by Pavel Bure. Bure's goal not only handed Ottawa its first defeat, but it gave the struggling Panthers their first victory as well. And all it took was that one win to boost the Panthers to a three-way tie for first place in the Southeast Division (at seven points), a division that is obviously having a slow start.

The Stanley Cup champion Devils, meanwhile, have had a fairly strong start, moving into first in the Atlantic after a pounding of the Pittsburgh Penguins Saturday night. New Jersey scored nine goals—eight in the two periods—as they shutout the humiliated Pens.

To boot, there were only three goal scorers for the Devils. Two players—Randy McKay and John Madden—each netted four goals, the first time that has happened in 78 years. (Two players by the names of Odie and Sprague Cleghorn of the '22 Montreal Canadiens did it against the now extinct defeat, but it gave the struggling Panthers their first victory as well. And all it took was that one win to boost the Panthers to a three-way tie for first place in the Southeast Division (at seven points), a division that is obviously having a slow start.

Hamilton Tigers.) It was Pittsburgh's worst home ice loss in history.

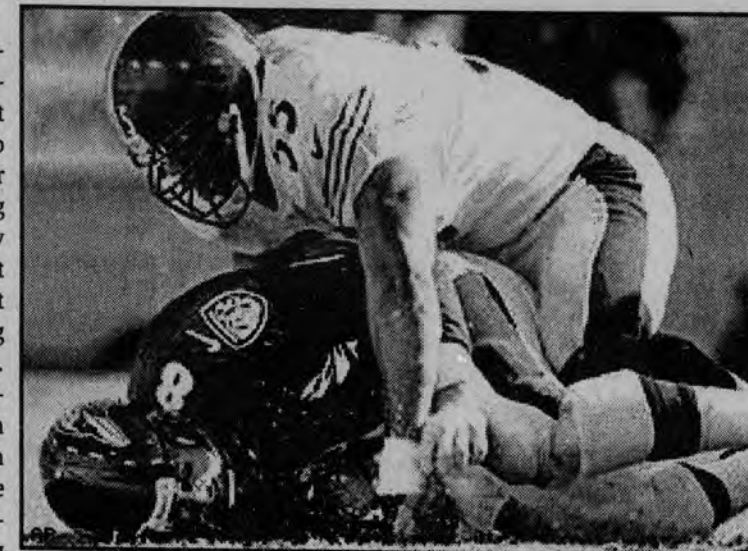

Now to a team surely not destined for the Stanley Cup—3-9 expansion Columbus. They displayed their future potential in a 4-1 rout of Los Angeles, in which keeper Ron Tugnet registered 45 saves in shutting down the Kings' top-ranked offense.

In other news, Boston Bruins head coach Pat Burns was fired last Wednesday. While he was a popular coach in Boston, it wasn't an unexpected move as the Bruins have struggled recently, including a four-game drought despite a 3-0-1 start this season.

However, Bruins GM Harry Sinden did surprise the hockey community with the announcement that his replacement for Burns was Mike Keenan. The reason it comes as a surprise, according to hockey commentator Al Morganti, is that a "tough" coach is usually replaced by a player friendly coach, or vice versa. In this case, Burns was a tough guy who was replaced by an even tougher guy in Keenan.

And speaking of the Bruins and their troubles, remember when they shipped off future Hall of Famer Ray Bourque last season? Well, no surprise to anyone, Bourque just became the NHL's all-time leader in points for a defenseman.

He reached that plateau last Wednesday, notching a pair of assists in the Avs' 2-1 win over the Predators. But the milestone is not necessarily his for good, as the player Bourque surpassed was Paul Coffey, and Coffey is still active ... active with the Boston Bruins, no less.

Solid defense has helped the Steelers win five straight.

NFL Experts' Picks

By Justin McCarthy and Ali Ahmed

Miami (6-2) at Detroit (5-3)

After relying on defense to win their first couple of games, the Dolphins' offense has emerged. Against the Lions, the Miami passing attack, led by Felder, better be accurate and make its presence felt. The problem for the offense is its lack of ability to play a full 60 minutes; this was seen in the offensive collapse against the Jets and Miami's slow start against the Packers—where they fell behind 17-0. Miami needs to gain some consistency on the offensive side of the ball to complement its tough defense. Detroit's defense should present problems for the Dolphins' offense. This matchup will be determined by Miami's effectiveness at controlling the line of scrimmage. The X-factor in this game is Batch; the Lions can only go as far he leads them. If Batch is able to control the tempo of the game and keep the Miami defense off-balance, then the Lions will have a chance to win.

Justin's pick: Dolphins 23-17

So far this season, the fact that the Dolphins have any offense at all with lame ducks Jay Fiedler and Lamar King is a tribute to the genius of offensive coordinator Chan Gailey, who if people remember was responsible for Kordell Stewart's 32-touchdown season. However, Gailey's genius can only take the Dolphins offense so far, and the Lions should provide the Dolphins offense with a big test. The Dolphins rely on their defense to win games, and once again their opponents will have to show big play ability and creativity to score. If James Stewart can run the ball for the Lions, then it should help Charlie Batch create down the field. The Lions offensive line will have to keep the impressive Dolphin pass rush away from Batch long enough for the receivers to get open. This game might not be the most fun game to watch—unless you love watching punts—but it will be a very important game in deciding the playoff standings.

Ali's pick: Lions 17-16

Pittsburgh (5-3) at Tennessee (7-1)

Both these teams are extremely hot and winning games. The Titans have won seven straight and have done so with a dependable mix of a strong defense and a balanced offense. The Steelers, however, are winning by relying almost entirely on their defense to carry them. During their current five-game winning streak, the Steelers have allowed only a single TD. The Titans have a legitimate passing attack with McNair having targets such as Pickens and Thielen, and they may have to rely on it with Eddie George having just recovering from a sprained ankle injury that knocked him out in the fourth quarter last week. Coach Fisher reported that the injury was not serious at all (but we can always hope). The Steelers will need their offensive line to control and maintain Tennessee's rush against both the run and pass. The Steelers will need their passing attack to be revived in order to contend with the Titans—who are the team to beat in the NFL right now.

Justin's pick: Titans 20-13

At the beginning of the season I thought Tennessee was getting lucky by winning their close games, but now it seems more like they just do what is needed to get the wins. Their current seven-game win streak has been led not only by Eddie George, but also by their defense. The Titans' passing offense, which would seem to have been a strength with the addition of Pickens has been decimated with injuries and the inconsistency of Steve McNair, who I still think is not a dependable quarterback. With their defense dominating and George having an MVP season, it would seem as though the Titans would roll over the Steelers, but the Steelers played them very hard earlier in the season and since then the have become dominant defensively. The only running back to gain 100 yards against the Steelers was Holmes in Week 1, and since then Fred Taylor, Corey Dillon and Curtis Martin have been shut down by the Steelers. For the Steelers to shut down George, the defensive line has to set up the linebackers well to make stops, and Levon Kirkland must be able to shed the blocks of fullback Lorenzo Neal. The Steelers should also be able to run the ball effectively against the Titans, but the game could come down to which special teams perform better, with both teams featuring excellent return men in Mason and Potratz. I think that this week the Steelers will prove to the league that they are for real.

Ali's pick: Steelers 24-17

Kansas City (5-3) at Oakland (7-1)

The Chiefs have won five of their last six—their lone loss during that span at the hands of the Raiders. The Raiders have made that victory part of their five-game winning streak. They rely heavily on the arm of Gannon, and therefore the Chiefs will need to pressure him constantly and force him to make mistakes. The Raiders need to obtain the efficiency of their running attack if they hope to continue their streak of victories. The Chiefs need to depend on their offense for victories, for their defense has held only one opponent to under three scores (and that was San Diego, who is the league's only winless team). The Chiefs will need to score early and have Oakland dig themselves out, for Kansas City cannot fall behind and have to play catchup.

Justin's pick: Raiders 19-17

This game, on paper, looks like a Raiders victory, but the Chiefs—especially having upset the Rams two weeks ago—should be ready to come out and defeat their high-flying rivals. Gannon has been able to lead the Raiders on a couple of late fourth quarter rallies that won the close games for them—games that they were losing last year. Now that Janikowski has been making his field goals, every Raiders fan is saying how the first round pick was worth it, but by making three out of four kicks he is just doing what every other kicker taken in the seventh round does. The Raiders should have taken a linebacker or another corner with that pick—but its too late now. The Chiefs, who have been defined by their defense traditionally, now are relying on a high-powered offense, which might have trouble against the Woodson-led Raiders. However, no one has been able to stop Chiefs' tight end Tony Gonzalez, and there is no reason why the Raiders can. This will be a very emotional win for the Chiefs that will have a big impact on the division standings.

Ali's pick: Chiefs 33-24

Denver (4-4) at NY Jets (6-2)

Denver cannot win games if they allow running backs to run for 278 yards—like Corey Dillon did. The Broncos' defense must be better prepared for the run this game, for they are facing an even better RB in Martin than they did in Dillon. The Broncos defense needs to regain its form during its first seven games, when it allowed an average of only 65 rushing yards per game! The Jets' offense relies upon Martin to be their work-horse, however, they still have Testaverde to deliver when needed. The key for the Jets' offense is to not turn the ball over like they did four times last week, which resulted in three scores for their opponent and a loss for them. The Broncos depend upon Griese to lead them, due to a lackluster running attack. Their chances will be decided in the matchup between the Jets' secondary and Griese and his receivers.

Justin's pick: Jets 30-21

Curtis Martin must be really looking forward to this game following the way Dillon ran all over the Broncos' defense. Shanahan made the Broncos' practices more physical, but the linebackers really need to pick up their game to stop Martin, who the Jets would be very willing to run around 35 times if he is successful. Martin is one of the most underrated running backs in the league, and he runs very similar to the way Dillon does. But the Jets still need to make sure that they have a good start and not rely on fourth quarter comebacks. The real interesting matchup will be how well the Broncos receivers do against the Jets secondary, considered one of the best in the league. This will be especially difficult since the Broncos will have a very hard time running the ball against the Jets. Also, the Jets' zone blitz scheme should put a lot of pressure on Griese, forcing him to make quick decisions.

Ali's pick: Jets 26-13

San Francisco (2-7) at New Orleans (5-3)

The Saints have made an unexpected turnaround this season and have begun to show some of the potential that Mike Ditka had promised (before he was fired that is). They owe it almost entirely to a resurgent defense and stability within their offense. Their defense will surely be put to the test this week against the third-ranked offense in the NFL. However, the Saints' offense should be able to manhandle the 49ers' dismal defense, which is allowing an average of 36.5 points per game this season. The Saints' will need to concentrate mainly on the aerial attack of Garcia, and their secondary could decide this game. Both teams like to have their RB's run patterns out of the backfield, so each should pay careful attention to this. If the 49ers hope to win, they will need their defense to create some kind—any kind—of a presence. Otherwise, they will need to rack up the points.

Justin's pick: 49ers 27-17

The 49ers' defense just isn't a. Its terrible in all facets, which should mean an easy day for Ricky Williams running the ball. Even if the Saints didn't have a good offensive line and Jeff Blake throwing the ball well deep, Williams would still have an easy time running against this defense. The Saints should be able to score more than the 36.5 points that the 49ers allow each week. Well at least the 49ers offense will keep the game interesting, led by Terrell Owens, who is playing like the Jerry Rice of old. The Saints' defense has been playing great, but they really face their first big test this week and so far their secondary weakness has been hidden by the play of their line, which is the best in the league. However, now with the way the 49ers passing attack has been working, they might just be exposed this week by the playmaking ability of Jeff Garcia.

Ali's pick: 49ers 34-24

Powell's Bison career far from over

After being told his career may be over, Bison star returns to the gridiron Saturday

By Brian Klotz

Many remember the scary scene. It was supposed to be a normal draw play in Bucknell's game versus Lafayette. The handoff left senior quarterback Lucas Phillips' outstretched hand and was grabbed by tailback Jabu Powell '02, who charged straight ahead.

In a kind of slow motion, witnesses could see the powerful head-on collision in the middle of the line. When the play was over and all the players picked themselves up from the pile, one player wasn't moving. It was Powell, and he laid there for almost 15 minutes, with barely any motion in his arms or legs.

"It was pretty scary," Powell said later of the event. "I had numbness in all four limbs of my body."

The injury and initial prognosis prompted great concern throughout the Bison football community, but a second opinion cleared Powell to return to the lineup this Saturday.

But the initial diagnosis wasn't so encouraging. "To be on the safe side, we wanted to check that it wasn't anything serious," Powell said.

"The team doctor referred me to a local spine specialist, and after looking at my spine canal, he realized it was narrow."

These results were staggering for Powell and the team, as it could've meant the end of a very successful football career.

"When I saw the first doctor, I was totally shocked, very upset and sad," Powell said.

"Football means so much to me."

"When it first came back that he might not be able to play again, I had great concern because the kid loves to play football," head coach Tom Gadd said.

"We decided to get a second opinion, and hoped for the best."

As these events progressed, fellow players stood by, anxiously awaiting news.

"When I first found out that he might not be able to play again, I was very disappointed and a little scared to find out how serious his injury was," George Cowan '02 said.

"Jabu is a good friend off the field."

Molly Campbell: the future of BU golf

By Molly Goeller

Her passion for the sport and her devotion to the team have allowed Molly Campbell '03 to lead the Bucknell women's golf team through the 2000 fall season.

As a freshman last season, Campbell led the team with a scoring average of 85.9 strokes per round.

Campbell has again captured the spotlight for the Bison this fall by recording the team-best score in each tournament she played.

"Every player on our team contributes to our overall success," head coach Kevin Jamieson said. "Molly Campbell, however, is a very gifted student athlete. She possesses the strength and knowledge of the game of golf that is needed to be successful at the college level. We depend on her great play at every tournament."

Campbell's teammates will all agree that she is a leader by example. Her enthusiasm on the golf course and her dedication to self-improvement are reflected in her skills as a golf player.

"I go out on the course with high expectations and can only hope to meet them," Campbell said.

The true sense of a "team player" is reflected in Campbell. Not only does she work hard for herself, she is always ready and willing to help other people on the team with their golf game. Campbell worked on her golf game throughout the summer months, in hopes of top performance during the fall season.

She has been rewarded with consistent successes throughout the season, as she was the team's low scorer in all of their meets.

"Molly is always consistent, and we can always count on her for a low score," states sophomore Jess Herich.

Highlighting her season, Campbell led her opening season mark at the Princeton Invitational in early October where she was the low scorer for the Bison with a season team low of 79. Ending their conference season with the annual Patriot League Tournament, the Bison women swept the first five places. Again, Campbell found success with her second place overall finish and low score of 80.

The season finale for the Bison, the ECAC Tournament, proved to be a disappointment for the team as a whole. However, Campbell held her own with a first round score of 84, and an impressive second round score of 79. Her combined score of 163 allowed her to be the low medalist for the Bison.

Finishing her fall season, Campbell was happy, but nowhere near satisfied with her performance. She seeks greater levels of improvement in upcoming seasons, with her primary focus on the spring season. "I hope to jump to new levels during the spring season," Campbell said.

The spring season will be a challenge for the Bison, as they will attempt to further prove themselves to the golfing community. Campbell will lead this talented group of women through another season, with high hopes of finding success.

"I am anxiously awaiting this spring. We are going to do some great things in the near future. I expect Molly, as well as everyone else, to pick up where we left this fall," Jamieson said. "We once again will look to Molly to provide us that special leadership on the field and to set an example of great play for the rest of the team to follow."

"Molly is a very special and talented individual and she deserves all the great things that will come her way."

Should be a pretty strong novice team."

Ray Bucknell

Bucknell is supposed to win the Patriot League. Winning is all that current undergrads have experienced, with Bucknell claiming three straight Presidents' Cups and seven in the past ten years.

So many Bucknellians won't be stunned to hear that our athletic teams are on pace to capture that honor again this year. But what is stunning is the dominating way our teams are doing it. As opposed to our normal pattern of consistently finishing teams in the top three in most sports while relying on our cross-country and track and field teams for championships, all of Bucknell's fall sports are making championship runs. It's time to sit back and enjoy what may prove to be one of Bucknell's most successful years in athletics—ever.

The Bison men's soccer, women's soccer, volleyball and field hockey teams have clinched spots in their respective postseason tournaments, with men's soccer and volleyball both one win away from hosting their prestigious tournaments.

The men's soccer team has had a dramatic turnaround this season—to say the least. After losing their leading scorer from last season and only scoring three goals in opening up the season 1-4-1, many people would guess that, at this stage of the season, nine would be their total number of goals and not their win total.

But a renewed scoring attack and the emergence of freshman goalkeeper Steve Whitaker have led the Bison to a 9-8-2 overall record and a first place standing in the league. The squad clinched its first postseason appearance since 1993 with a 2-1 overtime win over Navy on Sunday, and can host the tournament for the first time since 1990 by claiming a win at Lehigh this Saturday.

The Bucknell volleyball team also got off to a shaky start, dropping eight of its first nine matches. But behind a balanced attack behind the hitting of Shannon Walker '02 and Brooke Bader '01 and a strong defense led by Brandi Trappaso '04, the Bison sit alone in first place in the Patriot League with a 8-1 mark. Wins in two of the team's final three league contests will guarantee Bucknell of a hosting role for the postseason tournament.

Spectators at 2000 Bucknell women's soccer games should have been warned: don't watch if you have a heart condition. 11 of the team's 16 games were decided by a goal or less, including six overtime thrillers and a tie.

But behind a stingy defense and clutch scoring, the Bison have been able to pull out many of the close ones, earning the third seed in this weekend's Patriot League tournament with a 3-2-1 league record.

Then there's field hockey, last year's runner-up to Lafayette for the league crown, who already handed their nemesis a 2-1 defeat this season. A stellar defense led by Katie Yingling '01, Monica McCorry '02 and goalkeeper Sonja Wettergreen '03 has the Bison poised for another trip to the championship game, as they enter the Patriot League Tournament as the three seed.

Let's not forget cross country. The women's team captured its third straight Patriot League Championship last Saturday, powered by junior Becki Marshall's second consecutive individual championship. This talented group has its sights set on a top-20 finish in the NCAAAs, after finishing 24th in the nation last season.

And the men's team also earned the University Presidents' Cup points, finishing second in the Patriot League Championships to rival Army.

And then there's football. The squad raced out to a 5-1 record behind junior Jabu Powell's All-American numbers. After an injury to Powell, the Bison fell to Lehigh, 21-14, and now find themselves in third place in the Patriot League. But with Powell now healthy and league co-frontrunner Colgate traveling to Lewisburg on Nov. 18, the Bison are in excellent position to improve their standing.

Never before has every Bucknell fall sports team been a legitimate contender for the Patriot League crown. It's really a tribute to the players, since each individual team has had to overcome a lot of adversity this season to get to where they stand today.

With the teams' successes to date, Bucknell is already assured of emerging as the frontrunner in the Presidents' Cup race after the fall sports season. But what could potentially happen in the next two weeks is unprecedented—Bucknell could finish in the top two in the Patriot League in every fall sport.

Both cross country teams have already achieved that, football can by winning its final three league games, and all four teams in the postseason tournaments have beaten or at least tied the teams they'll need to defeat to advance to the finals.

So keep a close eye on the Patriot League Championships over the next two weekends. It's a great time to be a Bucknell sports fan—and a sports editor.

Phillips leads Bison past Fordham

By Cory Nadler

Coming off a 21-14 loss to Patriot League frontrunner Lehigh, the Bison bounced right back and picked up a convincing 27-13 win against Fordham in front of an enthusiastic Homecoming crowd. The Orange and Blue continued to keep themselves in contention for the post season with the victory, and clinched their sixth straight winning season.

The Bison began the scoring in this game when Lucas Phillips '01 completed a four-yard touchdown pass to Jim Horan '03. Horan caught seven passes on the day for a total of 94 yards and continues to be Phillips' favorite target. Phillips completed 20 of 34 passes for the day for 194 yards, earning him Patriot League Offensive Player of the Week honors. Not only is Phillips playing extremely well, but he has truly learned how to lead his team to victory. "Lucas Phillips has taken over the leadership on this team," head coach Tom Gadd said.

The Bison defense played another outstanding game, as they have done all season long. The Bison did not allow a Ram point for the first 29 minutes of the first half and senior Kevin Eiben's sixth interception of the season led to a 26-yard field goal by sophomore Chris Lundberg to put the Bison up 10-0.

Fordham finally got on the board when their quarterback, Mike Mucci, ran in from three yards out in the closing seconds of the first half, cutting the Bison lead to 10-6.

On the opening drive of the second half, Phillips marched the Bison down the field and completed his second touchdown pass of the day to J.C. Morgan '04 from three yards out. This pushed the Bison lead to 17-6 early in the third quarter.

The Bison made the score 20-6 when Lundberg knocked in a career-long 47-yard field goal less than seven minutes later.

Later in the third quarter Eiben recorded his second interception of the game. This gave the Bison great field position, but their field goal attempt was blocked. Eiben now has seven interceptions on the season, the highest total on the team and among the highest in the Patriot League.

"I could tell where (Mucci) was throwing the ball when he looked right at his receivers," Eiben said. "Our good defensive line makes my job a lot easier."

The Rams added their final score at the end of the third quarter following a Bucknell fumble. This made the score 20-13 heading into the final quarter of the game, but the story of the end fourth quarter would be the Bison defense.

Throughout the fourth quarter the Fordham offense not only got inside the Bison red zone twice without scoring, but they had first and goal situations twice and did not put any points on the board.

The Bucknellian apologizes for grave production error

By Brian Watson

It has been a sad week for The Bucknellian and for the University. The Holocaust denial advertisement that appeared in last week's issue generated an outpouring of grief, anger and disappointment from those who viewed its outrageous content.

For those who did not have the opportunity to read the letter of apology sent to all members of the campus community via email on Monday, we would like to reiterate that the inclusion of this horrific advertisement was a devastating error on the part of The Bucknellian. It was in no way a movement to support free speech, nor was it in support of the appalling claims expressed in the ad.

During the past several days, we have been speaking to members of our staff and reviewing the circumstances contributing to this unacceptable error. Many members of the community have expressed skepticism as to how an advertisement of this nature could have slipped through the editorial process. The answer, unfortunately, is simple.

Three weeks ago, The Bucknellian made a rather significant transition to digital technology. This process has allowed us to bring the final version of the newspaper to press each week on a CD-ROM as opposed to bringing a hard copy of each page. While this has made production more efficient, it has altered many aspects of our editorial process.

Because our former method of production required each page to be printed and the ads to be hand placed by the editors, we were able to conduct an unofficial screening process. Due to digital technology, however, the hand placement of advertisements became unnecessary as they could be inserted via the computer. This ad unfortunately appeared on a page that was devoted entirely to advertisements. For this reason, the section editors had no need to print it for the initial round of copy editing, and it therefore went to press overlooked.

It is indeed an unacceptable error, but unfortunately we have discovered the loopholes in our transition in a most difficult way. We have also spoken with members of our staff to determine how and why this advertisement was initially placed on the page. The responsible party has admitted to the error. The action did not appear to be malicious, but simply an instance of very poor judgement. The individual has expressed extreme remorse and has conse-tended to never occur again. We are taking steps to raise staff awareness and create a more thorough editorial process. We further intend to devote more attention to addressing awareness on campus in upcoming issues.

On behalf of our editorial board and ourselves we would like to express our most sincere apologies to all those affected by this tasteless advertisement. We understand that this will provide little comfort for those deeply hurt, and we continue to be saddened by the fact that The Bucknellian has imposed such negative emotions on readers throughout the University, the surrounding community and the country. We hope that, in the future, we will be able to

Kristallnacht comes to campus Thursday

It will be held in Larison Dining Hall and there will be a dessert reception following the program.

Kristallnacht is often called "the night of broken glass." Nazis roamed through Jewish neighborhoods and broke windows of Jewish businesses and homes.

During the program, Fred Voss will speak about his experiences with the Holocaust and various other hate crimes. He will also mention the recent ad that appeared The Bucknellian.

Those who signed from all duties at The Bucknellian. We would also like to emphasize that The Bucknellian will not be collecting any money for printing this advertisement.

Our current focus is now ensuring that an error of this magnitude be avoided in the future.

The Last Amateurs celebrates student-athletes

By Brian Watson

Besides the usual sportswriters covering the Patriot League beat last season, the men's basketball team and its Patriot League opponents met a new face, a seemingly casual onlooker who talked to them on team buses and in their respective locker rooms.

But this writer wasn't there to cover games—he came to write a documentary about student-athletes who play for the love of the game, not the notoriety. His name is John Feinstein and his book, The Last Amateurs, released last week, chronicles the 1999-2000 season, focusing on the players and coaches that make the Patriot League what it is.

"I've gotten so sick of the cesspool in big-time college athletics, so I wanted to do a book about true student-athletes," Feinstein said. "I just decided that the Ivy League gets a lot of attention, but the Patriot League hasn't been on that level. So I thought it would be more fun to write about kids who didn't get that attention but stuck to the basics."

Men's basketball head coach Pat Flannery '80 was thrilled about the prospect of having one of the nation's top sports authors chronicle the season.

"I think the foresight and thoughtfulness that he would write a book and have that a good of a feeling about what we're doing in the Patriot League speaks volumes about what we're all about, and, historically, what the League is all about," he said.

Feinstein was drawn to the conference because the student-athletes do not receive athletic scholarships, but Patriot League presidents will convene Dec. 12 to decide the future of its need-based aid tradition.

The upcoming vote could change an aspect which has been a cornerstone of Patriot League athletics since its inception.

"I've gotten so sick of the cesspool in big-time college athletics, so I wanted to do a book about true student-athletes," Feinstein said. "I just decided that the Ivy League gets a lot of attention, but the Patriot League hasn't been on that level. The Bush/Cheney ticket yesterday remained confident of victory.

Brumburg addresses femininity

Author speaks on challenges associated with female sexuality

By Brooke Rea

The Women's Resource Center has recently recognized a need for programs that educate, support, and enlighten young women at Bucknell about the unique challenges they face in today's society. The most recent of these was a captivating lecture by award-winning author and historian Joan Jacobs Brumburg Ph.D., entitled "From Corsets to Body Piercing: How History and Culture Shape the Experiences of American Girls."

This event brought campus and community members to the Vaughn Literature Auditorium last night for a unique talk which drew on the research from Brumburg's two books, Brumburg currently serves as the Stephen G. Weiss Presidential Fellow and Professor at Cornell University, where she teaches History, Human Development, and Women's Studies.

She began her talk by explaining the method of research for her second book, The Body Project, which was published in 1997. The information in the book was gathered through the reading and analysis of more than 150 personal diaries of young girls from the 1850s to the 1990s.

Brumburg's groundbreaking work traces the changes in attitude, appearance, and cultural representation of the female body throughout history. "What many of us don't understand," Brumburg said, "is that having girls write about sexuality and talk about it is, even today, revolutionary."

The diaries reflect an increased openness and awareness about female sexuality throughout the years, and they trace the increased negativity women have felt toward their bodies since the advent of the community and University organizations.

Students to voice concerns to Trustees

By Laura Day

This weekend, the University will be holding the semi-annual Board of Trustees Meeting.

As part of this event, the trustees are interested in hearing the concerns of the student body and sharing comments about the progress of the University.

Consequently, the trustees have designed a program to interact with students in a discussion setting to exchange ideas and concerns.

Trustee Access Day is now a standing tradition and all student organizations and individuals are encouraged to participate.

"Trustee Access Day enables students to tell the trustees exactly what they think the important issues are," BSG V.P. of Finance Nate Sorber '02 said.

The Trustees are very interested in being informed about what the student body's interests and priorities are.

In order for them to make policy decisions and recommendations that will best suit the campus community, it is instrumental that they are aware of students' concerns and opinions.

"What the students share with the trustees won't be cast aside; it will be truly considered and thought about," Sorber said.

Trustee Access Day gives students an opportunity to voice support and opposition over various issues on campus, as well as providing a forum for an idea exchange.

"One of the most important aspects of this forum is the exchange of unfettered and uncompromised opinions," BSG VP of Operations Jason Dolan '01 said.

Students or organizations that are interested in meeting with representatives from the Board of Trustees will be given 45 minute blocks beginning at 12:45 p.m., 1:30 p.m., and 2:15 p.m.

Appointments are scheduled on a first-come, first-served basis until all Trustees available have been engaged. To schedule an appointment, students can email

Dottie Minium at dminium@bucknell.edu

All participants in the Trustee Access Day are invited to attend the Access Day Dinner in the Terrace Room. The reception begins at 5 p.m., followed by a faculty presentation and dinner. The evening ends at 7 p.m.

predict Gore as the winner after his wins in Pennsylvania and California. A win in Florida would have sealed the victory for the Gore/Lieberman ticket, but the eventual gains by Bush put him back in contention for the Electoral College vote.

Gore won the big states on both coasts, but Bush made strong showings in the "Bible Belt" and took home Clinton's and Gore's respective home states, Arkansas and Tennessee. No president since Woodrow Wilson in 1916 has won his home state.

Independents did not play a major role in the election, as they split evenly between the major party candidates. The Ralph Nader factor also had a less than expected impact, as the insurgent Green Party candidate failed to take substantial battleground state votes away from Gore.

According to The Washington Post, Bush and Cheney have already taken on the appearance of an elected ticket. The paper reported that Bush aides said the Texas Governor would immediately nominate former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Colin Powell as his secretary of state and Andrew Card, the Republican National Convention chairman and former transportation secretary, as his chief of staff.

World caught in U.S. election confusion

Governments around the world have been on tenterhooks as the final dramatic chapter in the U.S. presidential race unfolds. Russia, China, Britain, France, the Netherlands, Turkey, Indonesia, Japan, South Korea and the European Union had all moved to welcome election of Texas Governor George W. Bush before rapidly backtracking as it emerged that Vice President Al Gore was still in the running.

China sentences 14 officials to death in graft case

BEIJING, China—Fourteen Chinese government officials were sentenced to death on Wednesday in one of the largest cases of official abuse of power exposed in China's five decades of Communist Party rule.

The former customs chief of the southern port of Xiamen, Yang Qianxian, the city's former deputy mayor, Lan Fu, and the former deputy police chief of the southern Fujian province, Zhuang Rushun, were among those sentenced to die. Three of the 14, however, received suspended death sentences, usually commuted to life in prison.

Founder of militant Japanese Red Army arrested

TOKYO, Japan (AP)—Police on Wednesday arrested a founder of the Japanese Red Army and a symbol of Japan's radical left during her more than 25 years underground.

Fusako Shigenobu, 55, was arrested as she and two companions left a hotel in the western city of Osaka. She was taken to Tokyo.

TV networks alternated coverage of the U.S. presidential election with live coverage of the progress of the bullet train taking her to the capital.

Outrage greets brutality shown on South African police video

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — South Africa reacted with horror on Wednesday to a video aired on state television which showed police dogs repeatedly savaging black prisoners during what was described as a training exercise for the canine unit. Karen Mokwenzi, head of the Independent Complaints Directorate (ICD), a police watchdog, told reporters that dog units throughout South Africa would be investigated.

"It is imperative for us to look at dog units across the country," she said, adding that at least one of the four dogs on the tape was still in service. The dog would be re-evaluated to see if, among other things, it had been trained only to attack black people.

Death toll inches toward 200 in Israeli-Palestinian clashes

The death toll in six weeks of intense fighting between Palestinians and Israeli security forces reached 197 on Wednesday with the deaths of six Palestinians and an Israeli woman.

The latest deaths came as Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat traveled to Washington for a meeting with U.S. President Bill Clinton, a few days ahead of a scheduled meeting between Clinton and Arafat's Israeli adversary, Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

Bush confident he will win election

Republican presidential candidate George W. Bush told reporters today he expects the recount in Florida to confirm his victory over Al Gore.

Accompanied by vice presidential running mate Dick Cheney at a brief news conference in Austin, Texas, Bush said that if he emerges as the winner, he will work hard to earn the confidence of those who supported Democratic challenger Al Gore.

Children infected with E. coli at petting zoo, officials say

LANSDALE, Pennsylvania (AP) — As many as 21 children became infected with E. coli during a visit to a petting zoo, health officials say.

Two of the children, girls ages 3 and 4, remained on kidney dialysis Tuesday. E. coli infections have been confirmed in 12 of the children and are suspected in nine others. All of them had visited Merrymead Farm.

Missing Oregon girl found after 15 years

PORTLAND, Oregon (AP) — Stremple had not seen her daughter since she left the little girl with a baby sitters Marcella Whitehead and Roland Homenykin in 1985.

The FBI is not sure whether to treat the case as a kidnapping or as an abandoned child case, but Mike Morrow, the FBI's supervisory senior resident agent in Eugene, says it is under investigation. The teen-ager told police she had been living with a couple who let her in Lovelock, Nevada, about 90 miles northeast of Reno, telling her they would contact her once they were safely away and tell her about her true identity.

Russia spy trial witness 'withdraws evidence'

MOSCOW, Russia — A key witness in the trial of Edmond Pope, an American accused of spying in Russia, has retracted his statement about providing classified information, Pope's lawyer said on Wednesday. Academic Anatoly Babkin, whose evidence supported charges against Pope, had written to the court saying he made the statement under pressure from investigators, said Pope's lawyer Pavel Astakhov.

Prosecutors claim former SLA fugitive's Web site endangered officers

LOS ANGELES, California (AP) — Prosecutors have asked a judge to double the bail for former Symbionese Liberation Army member Sara Jane Olson, saying she endangered the lives of two police officers by putting their addresses and phone numbers on an Internet site.

Olson is awaiting a January trial on charges that she tried to plant pipe bombs under two police cars 25 years ago. Both officers are scheduled to testify against her.

Looking ahead to the class of 2005

By Ryan Delahanty

This upcoming weekend marks the return of the highly successful Prospective Students Weekend, a chance for high school seniors to learn more about the University.

Administrators, faculty, and students will be on hand to answer questions and educate the prospective students about the community.

The Office of Admissions is interested in attracting and enrolling a very talented and diverse group of students for the Class of 2005.

"Given the strong qualities of the past three classes, we wish to build upon this momentum to enhance the overall quality of the student body," Gil Villanueva, senior associate director of admissions said.

Relative to last year's class, the admission's office will be using the same criteria while evaluating possible candidates for the class of 2005. The Office of Admissions hopes to attract roughly the same amount of the University's yield rate has increased in recent years. As for diversity, the admissions staff is charged with enrolling a class that is reflective of our society," Villanueva said.

Reflective of other schools in the Patriot League, the University's tuition has risen steadily over the past few years and could have a potentially negative effect on the number of people who apply. Villanueva doesn't necessarily agree.

"Tuition increase may or may not diminish interest in the University. Tuition increases have been a trend for institutions of higher education in the past decade, especially at prestigious colleges and universities," he said. "The University's tuition increases have been at a lower rate relative to our peer institutions."

Currently close to 500 prospective students have registered for this weekend's open house program. Along with their families, the admissions office may have as many as 1200 guests on campus this Saturday. The need for student volunteers is great.

With so many people coming to campus, the Admissions Office needs students to field questions, work tables, and generally assist prospective students and their families.

Villanueva, talking about the growing popularity and success of the weekend said, "Interest in the University seems to be increasing. This coming open house marks the second such program for the fall."

"The University began hosting fall open house three years ago," he added. "The admissions staff is very pleased to have such a strong interest from prospective students and their families."

Girls possess unrealistic body image goals twentieth century. Brumburg read excerpts from entries in 1892 and 1922 that illustrated a shift from an inward appreciation of "good works" and personal virtue, to an outward emphasis on "good looks." These cultural and psychological changes have contributed, she believes, to the current state of young American women.

That state, he figures shows, is not a good one. Currently 76 percent of American 17-year olds report that they bodies and their relentless pursuit of physical perfection is all part of what Brumburg calls "The Body Project." Many things contribute to the astounding severity with which women today self-scrutinize their bodies, including media representation, technological advancements, and changes in cultural norms. Since the nineteenth century, girls have been striving to control their body and make it attractive, but never has outward appearance taken 1920s when dieting, shaving, and clear skin became the subject of countless ads in teenage magazines. As this message has intensified, it has become acceptable for women to engage in a kind of "Bad Body Fever," or an obsessive self-criticism of one's physical appearance.

This is a result, Brumburg explains, of women internalizing the messages of the visual, media-based culture in which we live.

Yet Brumburg does not blame any one factor for the state of women today. "It is simple-minded to say that Anorexia Nervosa and Bulimia are caused by Calvin Klein ads," she said. "There are many cultural and biological changes that have accumulated over the last 150 years to create pressure for women and make them uncomfortable with their bodies. It is a multi-level problem and can be looked at from a complex historical perspective."

Brumburg based the bulk of her lecture on a series of slides, consisting of ads and photos from the last 100 years. She touched upon "all of the causes of change cited in her book," tracing the depictions and attitudes of women chronologically from the 1800s to the present.

The twenty-first century, she believes, is a difficult time to be a young girl growing up in America. "Americans believe more than ever before in the perfectibility of the human body, and I believe that the level of adolescent self-consciousness can be directly raised or lowered by the media."

The lecture was followed by a question-and-answer period and then a reception in Smith Library, where guests could talk with Brumburg one-on-one.

Joan Brumburg speaks on the importance of self-esteem are dissatisfied with their body, while doctors regularly see girls as young as eight or nine who are dieting.

"Young girls today are more exacting about their bodies than any other aspect of their lives," Brumburg explained. "When there is a problem with school, friends, or family life, girls turn to their body and see changing their appearance as a way to fix everything."

Females' obsessions with their such a central role in society as it does today.

"Girls today ask the same questions as before," Brumburg said. "Who am I? What do I want to be? What do I want to do? But now the answers seem to be more than ever, revolve around the body."

Girls today tend to think that the perfect appearance will bring them the perfect life, and the media has been feeding them that notion since the ries about great kids."

"This isn't just unique to Bucknell kids. He got to know kids from every institution. Each one of them has their own story, a unique and different perspective," he continued.

He also said that The Last Amateurs will not be a eulogy for the League's scholarship-free tradition. "We didn't start the scholarship talk, we inherited it," Flannery said.

"Regardless of scholarships, we'll have the same quality student-athletes; in fact, there's a possibility that [with scholarships] we'll get stronger student-athletes."

Flannery believes that the League's legacy will live on as long as its members stay committed to their ideals. "This book will last an eternity as long as you have these schools—the Lehighs, the Navys, etc.—and that we all know, institutionally, what we want to be, these kids will be the same."

He continued, "I completely disagree that scholarships will transform people into dark, devious student-athletes. It would never happen—we won't let it happen. We will continue to have the same caliber of student-athlete that drew John Feinstein to us."

Flannery is so focused on the upcoming season that he does not plan to read the entire book until afterward. But he does recommend The Last Amateurs to anyone interested in true collegiate sports.

"If anyone is looking for what college athletics is about—its form, the quality of the student-athletes and all the things that make it so exciting—they will certainly enjoy this book," Flannery said. "I have every confidence that, whatever happens, he wrote about our student-athletes. And if that's the focus of this book, then, in my mind, it has to be one of the best books ever written."

The Last Amateurs can be purchased at the University Bookstore.

A lesson in life

This past week the campus witnessed one of the most controversial incidents in years, but instead of The Bucknellian investigating the event, the staff was to blame.

The advertisement that unexpectedly appeared on page 16 of last week's Bucknellian, entitled "Proof of 'Gas Chambers'" was never intended for placement and does not in any way reflect the opinions of the paper's staff. The advertisement was not placed maliciously nor did The Bucknellian intend to utilize it as a tool for free speech.

The ad was simply tasteless and horrific. While we are learning to work as campus journalists in a professional manner, tirelessly looking to uncover pertinent campus issues, we realize that we have a moral obligation to our readers.

The past week has been overwhelmingly stressful in dealing with the understandable emotional backlash from numerous community members. The staff of The Bucknellian underwent a twisted experience that led us to reexamine our practices.

We hope that the community now understands the scenario that led to the ad's placement. From what we have learned, we know that we cannot allow a mistake like this to occur ever again.

Time will never heal the pain that has been inflicted by the horror of the Holocaust, and the presence of the advertisement only makes it more painful. We are extremely remorseful that we were the catalyst for any further suffering.

As a child of parents who escaped the evils of Hitler and who had grandparents perish in the concentration camp at Theresienstadt, I am deeply disturbed that you decided to publish "Proof of 'gas chambers'" (The Bucknellian, Nov. 2, 2000). It is incomprehensible that this advertisement was published given your stated advertising policy that you reserve "the right to deny any advertisements if offensive, illegal or in bad taste." We are outraged that anyone can still deny that over 11 million people were slaughtered in concentration camps during the Holocaust of World War II.

We support the first amendment and that the media have a right to publish this advertisement, but we believe you also have a responsibility and duty to balance this propaganda with a reasoned attempt to express the truth. This should be inherent in your editorial responsibilities. It is very disturbing to see that The Bucknellian may have unwittingly served the cause of neo-Nazism.

It is a privilege for us to serve on the Parents Advisory Board and we are heartened that the University is taking this seriously. President Rogers and the Faculty & Staff of the University are to be commended for their swift, thoughtful and reasoned actions taken to date. However, it will be very disappointing if the students don't learn from this what is the truth, what is propaganda, and how to tell the difference.

As publicity vice-president of Hillel and as a Business and Politics layout editor for The Bucknellian, I am very disturbed by the Holocaust-denial advertisement that was placed in last Thursday's issue.

Not only is the advertisement itself offensive, but the fact that it was placed in our school's newspaper is even more insulting to every person at this school and to every person who is related to this school. This advertisement makes me feel equally uncomfortable as a Jew, Bucknell student, and member of these organizations. The goal of a newspaper is to provide readers with information in a tasteful fashion. Whether it is an article or an advertisement, the information should not harm a group of people like this advertisement has.

Throughout the Holocaust, millions of people died, not just Jews. Trying to deny that this horrific event occurred is atrocious. Last spring in England, a judge called David Irving "an anti-Semitic, racist Holocaust denier who associated regularly with neo-Nazis and deliberately distorted history to serve his own political views" (Time Magazine, April 24, 2000).

Irving brought the libel case against American professor Deborah Lipstadt. Her book Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory called Irving "one of the most dangerous spokespersons for Holocaust denial." Irving lost the case. Although this is a step in the right direction, we need to continue to work together to educate people about the Holocaust and other hate crimes.

On Thursday, November 9, please join Hillel, Muslim Student Association, Kappa Alpha Psi, Voices of Praise, and NAACP as we welcome Fred Voss to speak about Kristallnacht and other hate crimes. We hope that the Bucknell community will gather together at this important event.

Letters to the Editors

To the Editor:

Bucknell has the reputation as a snotty, trust-fund baby school, among other things. And now, since it has been published for all to see, Bucknell has the reputation as a supporter of the neo-Nazi movement. Yes, didn't you know, we are moving towards becoming an anti-Semitic school. In last week's Bucknellian, an ad ran entitled "Proof of 'gas chambers'".

The ad showed two pictures from Auschwitz concentration camp in 1944. The pictures were identical except that one depicts a column of gas rising in the background of the picture, while the other did not. The ad claimed that the "holocaust industry" has airbrushed in the smoke from the crematoria to try to show evidence of the Holocaust. The ad continues on concluding that "that worlds awaits proof (real proof) that during World War II the Germans gassed ONE human beings as part of a program of ethnic genocide".

Yes I knew when I enrolled in Bucknell that I would be one of few Jewish students, but I was not aware of the insensitivity to Jewish students and blatant anti-Semitism that this school was moving to support. The fact that The Bucknellian staff found no element of "bad taste" in this ad, as they claim they have the right to deny in their advertising policy, leads to no other conclusion than that the staff was in support of this ad. In defense The Bucknellian may claim a first amendment protection, but the fact remains that Bucknell is a private institution, and as the advertising policy states, they have the right to deny any advertisement. One would assume that this school would take an active interest in denying those ads that instigate racial, ethnic, or religious controversy.

I can no longer say that I am proud to attend this University, as it supports such absurdity and failed in the following days to relinquish any sort of apology. I am now left with the responsibility of preventing my family and friends from ever reading this ad, having lost loved ones themselves in the Holocaust. For Bucknell's sake, I hope that last the paper's last edition did not make it to the front stoops of Jewish trustees or alumni.

To the Editor:

As we all learned in high school history class, the Constitution was not written to be a rigid "black and white issue" document. The First Amendment provides us with the freedoms of speech and press, which cause many of these "gray" areas daily. This of course applies to The Bucknellian, as with any publication, but I would like to express my utter appall, disapproval, and even embarrassment with an advertisement appearing in the Nov. 2nd issue. When your editors and advisors did their journalistic duty of proofreading and scanning the layout before going to print, I'm sure someone on the staff took note of this advertisement for the Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust—but obviously no one challenged its publication.

I'm not of Jewish descent. My family members weren't murdered in death camps, but I have friends who have, as I'm sure many students and faculty on this campus do.

Your advertising policy states that you have the "right to deny any advertisements if offensive, illegal or in bad taste." This advertisement offends me. It demonstrates backward thinking that our generation and no further generation should be tainted with. The printing of this advertisement represents a step back into the social Dark Ages, in my opinion. Could the Advertising Representatives, or any staff member, please explain why The Bucknellian would be so desperate for funding that they would accept payment to run an advertisement that promotes beliefs that "the world awaits proof (real proof) that . . . the Germans gassed ONE human being as part of a program of ethnic genocide"? I think it would be much more noble to run a free philanthropic advertisement for the National Holocaust Museum in Washington D.C. so that we "never forget" the terrors of the Holocaust like I hope I can forget this offensive act by your staff.

To the Editors:

On Nov. 2, The Bucknellian published an "advertisement" that requires our response as historians. The group that placed this ad claims to seek dialogue when in fact they have made such dialogue impossible. We need not recount what almost all who read this brief response will know. Yet, we must address the question that surely arises when confronted with such blatant untruths: how do we know whose historical facts are trustworthy? Indeed, this skeptical question and critical inquiry are fundamental to the work of the historian.

Historians are devoted to the critical investigation of evidence. Yet, under the guise of promoting historical inquiry this group seeks to reject all the evidence and questions that contradict their conspiracy theory, and they maliciously deny the truth of an atrocity, the Holocaust. There is an abundance of evidence from Allies, Germans and survivors alike documenting the facts that this group's claims are merely the product of a Jewish conspiracy. There comes a time when we should not accept certain assertions as just another version of the past. This is one of those times.

To the Editors:

I was shocked and dismayed to see an advertisement denying the Holocaust appear in the Thursday, Nov. 2, 2000 edition of The Bucknellian. This ad has caused hurt and disbelief not only at Bucknell but also in the surrounding central Pennsylvania community. I am reassured by the quick response that the coeditors of The Bucknellian took in apologizing for their mistake. Does this take away the hurt that the ad has caused? Maybe not, but the apology is a first step. The one good thing that has been generated by this terrible mistake is a response by the campus community to educate everyone about the Holocaust. I urge everyone to support and participate in the efforts to have a conversation about the realities of the Holocaust.

I trust that The Bucknellian will improve its procedures so that no ads of this type can be placed ever again, and I hope that the response of the Bucknell community to those who would deny that the Holocaust occurred will be a strong and united opposition to those who lie and make justifications for genocide.

Europe loses millions to American cigarette smuggling

By Gretchen Schrock

Got a complaint? Upset about some issue? File a lawsuit. That is exactly the course of action taken by the European Commission, the executive body of the European Union, against Philip Morris Company and the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company in effort to obtain damages from these American tobacco companies' involvement with organized crime in smuggling cigarettes into Europe.

Why would the European Union care about cigarettes infiltrating the black market? Like the greedy tobacco companies, the European countries are concerned with the loss of revenue. European government officials assert that they are losing billions of dollars in customs and tax revenues because of illegal sales of American cigarettes, which they believe involve American manufacturers.

It is extremely plausible that the tobacco companies are deeply involved in such a deceitful scheme, considering that they are faced with little or no growth in sales in the United States and are forced to aggressively expand their overseas sales and marketing. The problem for the cigarette manufacturers is that in most of Europe, cigarettes are subjected to various taxes and import duties, causing the price to tremendously increase and limiting how much the market for cigarettes can expand. For instance, if one were a nicotine addict in Great Britain, one would have to pay $5.25 a pack to relieve one's craving.

How does a competitive company who is already dealing with numerous expensive lawsuits deal with such a dilemma? Contact all of one's Al Capone-wannabe friends, ask for a favor and sweeten the deal with a little money on the side? No, just create elaborate schemes to move cigarettes into Europe.

According to the lawsuit, R. J. Reynolds would sell cigarettes from its offices in Miami to a Panamanian company that would arrange for the cigarettes to be shipped to a warehouse in Rotterdam. Then paperwork would be generated to show that the cigarettes were destined for the Canary Islands.

However, the intended market was Barcelona where the cigarettes arrived by truck. To cover one's tracks, do something like Philip Morris and order the systematic destruction of documents relating to smuggling.

Since the European Union has opened borders, which was designed to promote the flow of trade among states, the transportation of cigarettes from low-tax countries to high-tax countries is relatively easy, a side effect which was not foreseen.

Other analysts have the opinion that the American lawyers who filed the lawsuit are looking for a sympathetic judge, who will award them a large financial settlement similar to those received by numerous other plaintiffs against the tobacco companies.

As health advocates laud this lawsuit, historical precedent is not on the European governments' side. Last year, Canada sued R. J. Reynolds for $1 billion in the Federal District of Syracuse, asserting that the company conspired to smuggle tobacco products into Canada to avoid taxes. The judge dismissed the case in July, ruling that American courts cannot be used to collect on other country's taxes. In addition, industry analysts have said that the governments will have difficulty proving exactly how much money was lost.

Knowing the deadly consequences of cigarette smoking and the anguish felt by the families of those killed by their addiction, this lawsuit will undoubtedly be welcomed as another effort to destroy the tobacco companies' desire to get more people hooked on their fatal product by using illegal and deceitful means.

The lawsuit faces many legal challenges, but in the end at least, another opinion against smoking.

Letters to the Editors

To the Editors:

By now much has been said about the advertisement from the "Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust" which ran in the Nov. 2 edition of The Bucknellian. We respect the statements provided by various staff members of The Bucknellian who have noted that the ad was accidentally placed, and we applaud the efforts of President Rogers to respond officially to this ad in his recent e-mail communication (dated Nov. 6). There is little doubt that this accident has reopened a wound of considerable depth felt by the Bucknell Jewish community, but we are optimistic that this wound can be healed through continued community-wide dialogue and education.

We will not take time here to rebut the claims of the organization placing the ad. This would only legitimize their ludicrous claim that the Holocaust—an event of extraordinary magnitude and overwhelming evidence—not only did not happen, but was created by the Jewish community for monetary and political gain. We find these arguments abhorrent and beyond the limits of reason to be worthy of response. We give them no more credence than those who make other hate-based conspiracy claims, and we urge others to dismiss them likewise.

Further, as members of the faculty we affirm the legal rights of all people to hold and (within certain parameters) express opinions deviant from the majority. The very concept of tenure is based on such a premise. However, at the same time, elements of the discussion since the ad appeared reinforce our concern about the inability of some people to distinguish reasonable claims and arguments from unreasonable ones. This inability to discriminate between ideas risks giving equal credence to all arguments regardless of their merit, simply because of a simplistic belief that, since everyone has a right to his or her opinion, all opinions should be considered equally. We reject this premise—while there is no doubt that all people are entitled to their own opinions, the university is based on the notion that some ideas are more worthy than others.

Part of the challenge of the modern university is to teach the skills necessary to evaluate claims of truth or falsity. We may argue over what those specific terms mean, but we cannot risk abdicating the larger responsibility to become more critical thinkers. The ad placed in The Bucknellian, though unfortunate, provides us with an opportunity to rededicate ourselves to the value of critical thinking. Theories suggesting the earth is flat or the moon made of cheese are now laughable because of their lack of merit—so too should be arguments denying the Holocaust.

[Those who wish to learn more about the bizarre and deluded positions of the organization purchasing the ad can find them described in Deborah Lipstadt's Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory (Free Press, 1993). Those wishing to publicly renounce these and similarly hateful attacks on humanity are invited to attend the Kristallnacht remembrance program (to be held on Thursday evening and sponsored by Hillel and other organizations) at which Fred Voss, Holocaust witness, will speak.]

An Abroad Perspective: Melbourne

By Keri Reiter

During September, the world's eyes were focused on a magnificent city half a world away. The 2000 Olympics gave everyone the opportunity to gain a little insight as to what a diverse, interesting, and beautiful country Australia is.

My discovery of Australia began much earlier than that. My first concrete memory of Australia was in sixth grade. In one of my classes, we could pay $1 to get a pen pal. I chose to write to someone in Australia, starting one of the most treasured friendships of my 21 years. Megan and I began writing when we were barely 11 years old. We sent letters, pictures and gifts throughout the years. When I went off to Bucknell, the mail never stopped.

Fast forward to the present when I got the chance to study abroad. Megan was not my only reason for wanting to go to Australia, but our correspondence did add to my interest. I left for Melbourne on a cold day in February, leaving behind snow on the runway in Newark, NJ. When I landed, after traveling for about 24 hours, it was 40 degrees. That's 40 degrees Celsius. Let's just say it was hot, and for the first time in my life I was sunburned by Valentine's Day.

During my five-month stay in Melbourne, I lived in one of 12 residential colleges surrounding the University of Melbourne. The college is a mini-campus in the city and is a common housing option for many university students. The international students consisted of people from everywhere else in the world, including 15 Americans. For example, my next-door neighbor was born in Japan, but now calls Switzerland her home. She will be in Melbourne for at least the next four years getting her "uni" education. She has traveled the world and is fluent in at least three languages. She is one of the very interesting and worldly people I met while I was there. One of my goals of the semester was to immerse myself in the Australian lifestyle. Living in a college gave me an advantage in that respect, being that those were the people I saw on a daily basis. One activity I participated in was an intramural swim team, where my mates cheered, "Good on ya, Kezza!" after the race. That's right, I even had my own Aussie nickname. They have nicknames for everything—people, places or whatever else you can imagine. It is not uncommon to find a "Macca's" while walking down the street (I mean McDonald's). "C'day mate, howrya goin'?" is a common greeting. But my mates Trev, Comdog, Ash, Marty, Alco, Mickey, Scotty and Momo would probably just "huck" on me for trying to speak like them.

I met my penpal Megan after I had been in the country for about two weeks. She lives about 20 minutes outside of the city in a town called East Keilor. We planned to meet in the lobby of my building that first time, not really sure if we would recognize one another. It was one of the oddest experiences I have ever had, but at the same time it felt like I was hugging a familiar friend. Megan brought me to her house on several occasions, on a weekend hiking trip to Grampians National Park and out with her friends. Thanks to her, I was able to further immerse myself in the culture and avoid feeling as if I was a complete tourist. Often her friends would interrogate me since I was the first American many of them had ever met. I felt like a representative of my country and tried my hardest to portray Americans well.

My pen pal experience was a unique part of my semester, but not the main part. I would see her every few weeks and we talked on the phone quite a bit, but for the most part, I was on my own. I went to class everyday, made friends, familiarized myself with the culture, and traveled.

Although I do not like to generalize and cannot speak for all Australians, the people that I encountered were friendly, easy-going, and really did follow the "no worries" lifestyle. It was a refreshing change from the fast-paced, competitive environment we are used to. They are also curious and bold, and have a fun outlook on life. The better you get to know them, the more they like to tease you, and being the token Yankee made me the ideal target of a lot of good-natured joking. It was not uncommon for perfect strangers to approach me on the tram upon hearing my accent. Some of the questions they asked made me really think about how we portray ourselves to the rest of the world. I was asked all sorts of questions, including "Do all Americans own guns?" I can only imagine how they must feel when Americans ask them if they drink Foster's, hunt crocodiles and ride kangaroos to school.

I often traveled on the weekends and breaks. Australia is a country of incredible and diverse landscapes. From the snow capped mountains of Tasmania to the desert of the Northern Territory to tropical north Queensland. Words are not enough to give the beauty of Australia justice. I wandered Sydney Harbor under the shadow of the opera house, watched the sun rise and set on Uluru (Ayers Rock), hiked through rainforests, dove at the Great Barrier Reef, saw kangaroos and koalas while hiking in the bush, camped in the outback where dingoes wandered by my tent and learned how to surf on famous beaches.

But whenever I returned to Melbourne, I felt like I was coming home. In my adopted city, I dined at the outdoor cafes on Lygon Street, enjoyed the nightlife, rode the trams and cheered for my favorite "footy" (Australian rules football) team at the Melbourne Cricket Ground with a hundred thousand screaming fans. I know I'm biased, but of all the places I visited, Melbourne was still my favorite city. It is clean, the people are friendly and the tram system that runs along the main streets makes transportation easy.

My Aussie mates told me that I was seeing more of their country than they ever had. That often repeated comment made me realize how little I have seen of the United States. On one of my last nights before I flew home, my pen pal's dad asked me, "So where are you going on your next trip?" I did not hesitate to tell him that, as anxious as I am to see the rest of the world, I would like to see more of my own country first.

I have to admit, the adjustment back to the United States has not been easy. Of course I am happy to be back with my family and friends. Once I got over my fear that I would forget which way to look when crossing the street, I thought I would be able to slip back into my regular life. Although that has not been as easy as looking both ways before I cross the street, I am doing okay. But when I watched the Olympic opening ceremonies, I admit I felt "homesick." As much as I wanted the Americans to win, watching the Australian 400 free style relay team beat us for the first time in Olympic history, a part of me was proud of 17-year-old Ian Thorpe as if he had been from

New Jersey. If I had to pick the best thing about my time in Australia, without a doubt I would say it was my mates. They taught me fun things like footy and how to drive on the other side of the street. We debated everything from political abortion issues to the always-controversial Rice Krispies versus Rice Bubbles argument at "breaky" in the morning. Through them I learned an appreciation for my own country. They helped me realize that the world is a much smaller place than I thought it was. Most of all, they taught me about friendship, and how it can continue even though I am now half a world away. No worries; I'll be back.

Wink Thinks

Dear Wink,

It is kind of hard to talk smack about one of your friends behind his back, but given the ordeal that I am going through, I am perfectly willing to do so. My whole problem relates to one of my best friends and his girlfriend who have been seeing one another for about a year now. They pretty much don't care who is around, or where they are, but they will almost instinctually just start to get on one another. The two of them are not just sexually active, they are sexually overactive, and will have sex at the most inopportune times.

Anyway, I went home a week ago and ended up going to a party at my best friend's house. At the party my friend opened up his hot tub, and a lot of the people who were at the party decided to hop in. I also jumped right in. We all went in and everything was cool. However, the next day I had the worst rash all over my body and I can only think of one thing it could have come from—the hot tub. My rash is better now and it turns out that I actually had a mild case of a treatable STD. I am also sexually active, but I really don't think I came into contact with the STD from my own activity. I have a strong suspicion that it may have been my friend's overactivity in the hot tub that led to my contraction of the disease.

I really feel like I should say something to my friend but I am unsure of whether it is my place. After all, I don't want to go accusing him of something that is just a hunch of mine. So do you think it is right to confront him on the issue?

Sincerely,

Hot Tub Trauma

Dear Hot Tub Trauma, I must say that I really feel for your situation, and I am sorry to hear that you contracted an STD from unknown origins. However, on the other hand I can't help but question what you were thinking in jumping in a hot tub that I am sure was used for something other than medicinal purposes.

Jacqueline Flicker—The Bucknellian

es. It makes absolutely no sense, and for the time being, it sounds like you were excited to see females in swimwear and therefore weren't thinking about your actions.

I think you should definitely say something to your friend. I am by no means a doctor, but I do not even know if you can get an STD by swimming in a hot tub. Therefore, you might want to check with your doctor before accusing your best friend of giving you an STD. After all, that is a pretty harsh claim to make, so you better be sure of the medical probability of this before making any assumptions. However, if your doctor tells you that a hot tub is a breeding ground for disease, then by all means confront your friend. You should let him know that he may be carrying an STD, and therefore is not only a threat to his girlfriend, but to anyone who uses his hot tub. I don't think that you have a choice about telling him, since other people might be innocent victims of his affliction.

This is by far one of the most obscure things I have ever heard, I wish you the best of luck in your quest to find the source of your unexpected illness.

Chilean Mapuche woman to visit University

A traditional Mapuche dwelling and the traditional ceremonial dress of the Mapuche.

By Laura Dunn

Carmen Curihuentru, an indigenous Mapuche woman, will deliver a presentation on the conservation of Mapuche culture, land and rights in Chile, on Monday, Nov. 13. During her stay here at the University, she will also visit some classes and speak individually with students.

Her visit will provide undergraduates, professors and members of the community with an excellent opportunity to learn about the current political, environmental and cultural struggles of an indigenous culture.

Carmen Curihuentru visits the University from Xeg-Xeg, a Mapuche organization in Temuco, Chile. The organization is currently focusing on projects involving the preservation of Mapuche land, culture and rights. Carmen will discuss these in detail and will also show a video of hydroelectric dam construction along the Bio Bio.

The Mapuches are an indigenous group in Chile that live in and to the south of Santiago.

droelectric dam (being built by RALCO) that will flood and destroy their homes, native lands and burial sites. In addition, forestry companies are in the midst of taking over a great portion of their land even as national highways increasingly divide it.

Despite such challenges, Chileans and Mapuches such as Curihuentru are working to preserve the Mapuche culture and language through the education of both Mapuche and non-Mapuche children. Intercultural Bilingual Education (a program that incorporates the Mapuche language, Mapuzungun, and culture in classroom teaching) is currently being implemented in a number of nursery schools, elementary schools and some high schools throughout southern regions of Chile and Santiago.

To hear more of Curihuentru's experience and her desire for positive change, the University community is invited to attend her presentation at 8 p.m. Monday, Nov. 13, in Rooke Chemistry room 116.

An unusual abroad perspective: animal behavior in Indonesia

By Mike Gumert

As a graduate student at the University, Michael Gumert received funding in 1999 to do research at Tanjung Puting National Park in Indonesia to observe the behavior of long-tailed macaques. The following is his personal account of his adventures and studies there.

"Kra, kra, kra."

The high-pitched voices of long-tailed macaques pierced the harmonious droning of insects in the forest. I moved towards the calls, knowing the monkeys would appear at any moment, as I pushed my way through the thickets of undergrowth. With one last swipe of my machete, enough foliage was cleared out of the way for me to see a circle of monkeys screaming in alarm within a small clearing.

At first, I thought that the cries were directed at me, but I quickly saw that their attention was focused elsewhere. They were all looking down at the forest floor, mothers holding tight to their babies, young males boldly approaching whatever the source of the threat was. The adult males ran around as if trying to maintain the sanctity of the group. For nearly an hour, I watched as the troop slowly went from a state of alarm to their usual calm state.

Before I had a chance to see what had triggered the chaos, I was met with a challenge from two young males, Kirby and Hannibal. They had both started charging me, displaying their two-inch fangs in an attempt to intimidate me. I did not have time to consider what had triggered this threat. I quickly snapped into defense mode, which I had learned from years of experience with this species in captivity. I directed my gaze to the forest

Once gone, Budi, too, moved off. I was amazed; Budi had broken up a fight between his family and I on my behalf. It seemed that my following the troop all summer had caused Budi to accept my presence as non-threatening or maybe even as an honorary group member who could follow where they went. With the fight over, I was finally able to see what had initiated all of the commotion. I moved over to where the macaques had previously directed their alarms and found a coiled python nestled in the leaf litter absorbing one of the few direct rays of sunlight penetrating through the canopy.

The entire Rimba troop was now out of sight, except for Hannibal, who was still showing interest in the snake.

Soon though, he, too, was off and there I was alone in the forest two meters from a python. I snapped a few photos, but was soon overtaken by probably the same fear that the monkeys had experienced just moments earlier—the fear of a potential predator. That emotion drove me to catch up with the rest of the group, for as natural law goes, there is safety in numbers.

And it was for that reason, to understand the human drive to be social, that I was there in Kalimantan Tengah, Indonesia (Borneo) observing the behavior of long-tailed macaques.

I am fascinated by the factors that have led to social systems and societies, and seek to better understand our evolution of morality and ethics, and helping Brian Smith, another graduate student, to teach species to count from one to four. He also serves as a teaching assistant.

But how did this intelligent, soft-spoken individual develop his passion for his unusual work? Gumert's interest in philosophy and his applications to animals has complemented a love for apes that extends as far into the past as he can remember.

"I always used to watch the National Geographic specials and read the magazine articles on orangutans. They were just my favorite animals," he explained.

At the age of 10, Gumert wrote letters to the people at Indonesia's Tanjung Puting Park, and one of the highlights of his childhood was receiving a reply from the vice president of the Orangutan Foundation. It was only a matter of time before he realized his calling.

"I didn't really consider it as a career until my second year of college," he said. "I thought about how I'd always loved animals, specifically orangutans, and that I really wanted to do something for the environment. And I followed that direction."

Gumert's fascination with orangutans grew as he followed his dream and blazed his path through life. He first encountered long-tailed macaques while working at Genesis Wildlife Center in the Poconos when he was 21 and his interest was sparked further during his tenure as an intern at the Jane Goodall Institute, where he was able to interact directly with the animals. He plans to continue his education in a doctorate program. He is currently considering Emory, UCLA, Duke, the University of Georgia and the University of Chicago.

There is a chance to meet Gumert and to hear him speak on orangutan awareness at 7 p.m. Thursday in room 5 of the biology building. It will be well worth the trek, for the University jungle is a far cry from those of Indonesia; you won't even have to pull out a machete to fight your way across campus.

Orangutan awareness has new national focus

By Sarah Gudenkauf

This week, Nov. 4-11, is the fifth International Orangutan Awareness Week. It is also National Pursuit of Happiness Week, according to certain electronic greeting card websites. Those of us intent on pursuing our happiness may not care so much about the possible extinction of another species. But then again, helping a cause can create happiness.

The two themes may, perhaps, complement one another.

Sponsored by the Orangutan Foundation International, Orangutan Awareness Week is always the first week in November. This particular week was chosen because it was the week in which Camp Leakey, Professor Birute Galdikas's research site, was established in 1971. People all over the world are participating to raise awareness of the plight of orangutans.

Professor Birute Galdikas, the founder of Orangutan Foundation International, has been studying orangutans in Tanjung National Park, Borneo, for 30 years. Professor Galdikas is a contemporary of Jane Goodall and has often been called the Jane Goodall of orangutans. Galdikas is also the president of the foundation, which was formed by a group of scientists and lay people for the purpose of conservation and study of orangutans. One of the major purposes of the foundation is to educate the public about these great apes.

The orangutan (whose name means "people of the forest") lives in the rain forests of Indonesia, on the islands of Borneo and Sumatra. Orangutans are the largest tree-dwelling animals in the world. Orangutans are the most intelligent primates aside from people along with the other great apes, chimpanzees and gorillas. They are very long-lived, with life spans of up to 50 years.

Orangutans are, however, highly endangered and very close to extinction. It is estimated that at one point hundreds of thousands of orangutans lived on land that ranged as far as South-east Asia. In recent years, numbers have declined dramatically; 30 years ago, when Professor Galdikas first began her research, there may have been as many as 50,000 to 100,000 orangutans living in Tanjung Puting National Park. Now, only 15,000 to 20,000 thousands remain. The estimates indicate that in the next 20 years, all wild orangutans will be extinct.

The only way that people will be able to study orangutans will be in zoos and other unnatural surroundings. The largest contributor to the sudden decline is illegal logging. The habitat of the orangutan is being destroyed at a rate of three times the growth of the forest. Many of the orangutan populations exist within national reserves where logging is illegal. Unfortunately, the governments in these regions are unable to stop logging from occurring.

Orangutans that do not live in national preserves also suffer from the effects of deforestation. Development destroys much of their natural habitat, and plantations and mines take over land where rainforests once existed.

Orangutans also suffer from poaching and the illegal pet trade. Many people of Southern Asia keep orangutans as pets, although this is casually float away. Illegal as these actions were, no one even tried to stop them. The logging tycoons had gained so much power that it was essentially legal; there were few who could do anything to stop it. Of course, authorities eventually tried to intervene and military

Does the foundation of these concepts exist in the minds of non-human primates or other animals? Research is starting to suggest that this is the case.

We are learning that many animals have the peaceful mechanism of handling and repairing conflict (as demonstrated above in Budi's reaction). Many animals also have developed complex systems that guide their reciprocal exchange of services.

This could potentially drive feelings of obligation and generate methods of punishment for those not upholding their relational obligations. Finally, numerous animals are capable of developing "friendships," or special relationships, in which they preferentially give services to those whom they "like" better.

But speaking of morality, justice and relationships, there is one relationship not being upheld at Tanjung Puting: humans' relationship with the environment. During my stay I used to count hundreds of illegal logs being rafted down the Sekoyner River (the main waterway in the park); I sadly watched the home of so many amazing species, including the orangutan, representatives and politicians came to the park in an attempt to stop the logging, urged on by the solicitations of Dr. Birute Galdikas of the Orangutan Foundation International.

This only made the loggers angry and, at the end of June, an Earthwatch group was threatened by a mob of militant loggers wielding "parangs" (Indonesian machetes). The boat on which I lived was sent up river to rescue the group. Although it was only a threat and the loggers had no intention of hurting the group, their point was made clear: "We will log for foreign aid and support, but the United States has only responded by placing embargoes on the items needed to combat their socio-political problems. Foreign aid is key in solving Indonesia's problems.

We must support the Indonesian people through their socio-political difficulties—much as Budi supported me in my social conflict with Kirby and Hannibal—if Indonesia's magnificent, primate forests are to be conserved.

For this reason, I urge you not only to think of Indonesia in passing as you read this article, but also to learn more about conserving it and all of its life.

Orangutans are not the only species affected by the problems of illegal logging. The destruction of the rainforest affects many organisms. The orangutan is such a well-known animal that is able to inspire the interest and concern of the public. It serves a very important role as the ambassador for all of Indonesia's animals.

The Orangutan Foundation International is not concerned solely for the welfare of orangutans, but also for the variety of other life forms that share its habitat. The foundation uses orangutan popularity to catalyze the movement for conserving the rainforest of Sumatra and Borneo.

Orangutan Awareness Week is not ignored at the University. Many activities are taking place to help spread awareness of the situation of orangutans. See complementary articles on Michael Gumert and his lecture entitled "Orangutan Conservation: Expanding Huxley's Ethical Garden." Gumert will also be running a table from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. in the Langone Center mall throughout the week.

If you've taken the time to read this article, you've taken the first step towards helping to spread orangutan awareness—you have made yourself aware of their problems.

Above all, take the opportunity this week to remember that the end of a species may be decided by human action. And human action begins, always, with the initiative of a few individuals.

Ball doesn't rock in the house

By Emily Hancheck

Ball in the House, the male a cappella group who performed in the Bison on Saturday night, possessed overflowing talent; like antifreeze spraying out of an overheated radiator with the cap removed. The group's beautiful voices came pouring out at the opening of their mouths. Unfortunately, Ball in the House sang less than I had anticipated. The group seemed compelled (by unseen demons perhaps?) to tell the audience somewhat insane details of their lives after each song. Annoyingly, most of these came with the tag, "Well, you know we're I'm from Boston . . ." At first this was cute, but it quickly became annoying.

Despite the beautiful harmonies Ball in the House produced, their repertoire of songs left much to be desired. Short of calling them a boy band, the point must be made that all of their original songs involved a theme of love, and wishy-washy love at that.

The titles and lyrics—"Burned" (You burned me) and "Scared" (I'm scared to fall in love, but if I ever do, I pray to God it's with you)—were clichéd and formulaic, giving the audience a feeling of shallowness that no depth of talent could compensate for.

Indeed, Ball in the House conveyed the most emotion to the audience during their covers of some '80's songs. The group should take their composing in a new direction to impact their audiences. Their lyrics are desperately in need of substance, but their talent gives them much potential if they incorporate new ideas outside the norm. It seems they have foregone this road in favor of attempting to tap the already jaded boy-band-love-song market.

If you're looking for fantastic voices, look no farther. However, if you prefer meaning along with your harmonies, keep seeking, because Ball in the House is an incredibly talented group that lacks dimension.

Movie Review

Charlie's Angels

Mary Agnes

Onscreen Angels

I wasn't exactly sure what to expect as I snuggled into my seat and broke into my Swedish Fish Friday night at the Campus Theater on Market Street. Images of a big haired Farrah Fawcett running around and pointing guns, ran through my mind, but director Joseph McGinty apparently had another vision.

After the first five minutes I realized that these were a brand new set of angels playing a goofier game. Despite the paper-thin plot and bundles of bad lines, I ended up leaving the theater feeling like somehow it was not a waste of time.

Natalie (Cameron Diaz), Dylan, (Drew Barrymore), and Alex, (Lucy Liu), play the three vixens who carry out Charlie's speaker phoned-in conquests, as their faithful boss Bosley (Bill Murray) tags along. The trio come up with some creative fight moves in this movie - Matrix style. And it's fun to watch, with a suitable soundtrack to accompany the energetic shots. In one scene, Prodigy's "Smack My Bitch Up" smirks along in the background as the girls chase after a villain and take turns delivering kicks to his chest.

Don't think this movie is some freaky feminist anthem. These super-smart women act pretty ditzzy most of the time. In keeping with the original Aaron Spelling series that ran from 1976-1981, there's still cleavage galore along with a large load of costume changes.

While some of her cutie kindergarten / valley girl dialogue gets annoying, Cameron Diaz's re-deems herself with goofy dancing numbers and makes you laugh right along with her quirky giggle, as she makes fun of her own lack of a butt while bouncing along to "Baby Got Back" in front of a crowd at Soul Train.

Tim Curry and "Friend" Matt LeBlanc show up on screen along with a bunch of co-producer Barrymore's buds including Luke Wilson who co-starred with her in Homefront and her soon to be hubby, Tom Green. Greene's part is pretty small, but he still manages to stir up some laughs as Barrymore's pathetic love interest, "the Chad." Barrymore tosses some corn (a la Wedding Singer) his way. In the end, while being tied up to a chair facing an onslaught of ill-doing males, she ends up comically karate chopping the whole bunch with her hands tied behind her back and claims "and that's kickin' your !" She exits that scene with her rendition of the "Moonwalk."

The film ends up delving into television's past, grabbing a show that began redefining culture's view of the women's power and resurfaces on the 2000 scene, creating a new breed of angels that are not only smart, tough and sexy, but able to laugh at themselves at the same time.

If you want to get your cerebrum squeezed, head over and catch a Hilpp flick, but if your head is starting to ache from all your homework, Charlie's Angels is a fun film that's entertaining enough.

Japanese anime: fascinating campus with new club

By Rachel Laskow

One day Louis Blau '03 was reading manga, Japanese comics, in a bookstore on Market Street. A worker approached Blau and told him that it would be interesting if the University showed anime, Japanese animation. With that spark, Blau went to BSG and formed the Bucknell Anime Society.

As the first series, the Bucknell Anime Society is watching "The Vision of Escaflowne," which FOX cancelled due to low ratings. This series is about a Japanese girl named Hitomi who runs track and reads tarot cards. She has visions that always seem to come true. One day a mysterious boy named Van arrives and Hitomi saves his life from a dragon. Van and Hitomi are taken to Van's homeland by a beam of light. This is only the beginning of this tale.

This series is just one example of anime. All anime originates in Japan and is made for the Japanese public and is then brought to the U.S. The Japanese consider anime to be an art form and a very common form of entertainment.

Anime's sophistication distinguishes itself from American animation, which often seems geared to children. "That's not always true. In anime, there is music, surprises, plot structure, and more," Blau said.

"Anime finely blends drama and comedy, yet also manages to smoothly weave in a little philosophy," Bucknell Anime Society President Christian Stebbins '04 said.

Anime can be for kids, teens, and adults. However, the U.S. markets anime to mostly children. "Anime isn't as popular in the U.S. because U.S. production companies portray anime as just another Saturday morning cartoon," Stebbins said.

"If they keep aiming the marketing at kids, it's just going to stagnate and it's not going to go anywhere," Emily Hancheck '04 said.

Courtesy anime.org

Although Blau just started the Bucknell Anime Society this year, he has been a fan of anime for years. He said, "Back in high school I discovered Sailor Moon. I tried not to watch it because I thought it was a show for girls. I started to watch it and realized that it makes you laugh one minute and cry the next minute."

Blau's favorite anime is Urusei Yatsura, a Simpsonsque show from the 1980s. Blau enjoys this show because of the show's comedy, many interesting characters, and social commentary.

As for the future, the Bucknell Anime Society hopes to increase the library with more anime titles. They also might go to an anime convention in Virginia in February.

The club usually meets on Sunday. Please contact Blau or Stebbins if you are interested.

MONTE/Brown performs Friday

MONTE/Brown Dance company takes over the Weis Center stage on Friday night as part of the Weis Center Series 2: Special Effects.

Elisa Monte and David Brown formerly performed as principal dancers with the Martha Graham Dance Company. In 1981 Monte and Brown founded their own troupe, MONTE/Brown Dance, and a year later won first prize at the International Dance Festival of Paris.

The Company incorporates diversity as a theme, an evident element throughout the performances and the staff. Dancers come from Barbados, Trinidad, Guadalupe, Cuba, Japan, France, and the United States.

"The company is electric. The dancers and choreography are sensual and muscular. It's acrobatic and balletic at the same time. And beautiful always," Bill Boswell, director of cultural events at Bucknell, said.

MONTE/Brown Dance performs throughout the U.S., with an annual season in New York, and has also been featured on national television networks across the globe, including some in Europe and Asia. The Company recently returned to the United States after performing in Europe, Russia, the Philippines and Singapore.

"Audiences around the world have raved," Boswell said.

Cap and Dagger celebrates 100th anniversary

Cap and Dagger sponsors reunion events

Accomplished alumni to come and celebrate

By Dennis Baumwoll

The Cap and Dagger, Bucknell's dramatic society, will celebrate the 100th anniversary of its founding with an alumni reunion this weekend.

The three-day celebration is being conducted in conjunction with the celebration of the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Association for the Arts Bucknell. The courses in theatre offered at that time.

For the next 18 years, Cap and Dagger was a modest enterprise with little support from the university, essentially a club that mounted amateur theatricals in Bucknell Hall or in the Lewisburg High School auditorium or wherever it could find a space in which to perform.

It was not until 1949, when the University's Department of English and arts administrators, many of whom are returning for next weekend's reunion.

The Association for the Arts inspired Berda Rittenhouse '53 who, late in 1973, suggested to the Executive Board of the Alumni Association that Bucknell needed an organization to give effective support to the performing arts much in the way the Bison Club supports athletics. The idea intrigued the board, which encouraged her to investigate the feasibility of creating such an organization. She did so energetically, and with the assistance of many sympathetic persons on May 30, 1975, she gained the endorsement of the Alumni Association, which appointed a committee comprised of James Logue '54 C. Willard Smith, Professor of English, emeritus and Berda Rittenhouse as chair, to pursue her vision.

During the ensuing twenty-five years the Arts Association has flourished and become a major contributor to the cultural life of Bucknell. It currently numbers more than 1,000 supporters and generates and distributes approximately $150,000 annually, independent of the university budget, for arts related activities. Expanding its role over the years, the Association for the Arts brought countless performances, lectures, exhibitions and workshops for the campus. In addition, the association funds the artistic endeavors of faculty, creating student awards and scholarships, and established The Academy of Artistic Achievement to honor members of the Bucknell community who have distinguished themselves in the arts.

The overlapping membership of Cap and Dagger and the Arts Association, belittles the joint celebration of their respective anniversaries, especially because the current President of the Association, Richard Humphrey '74 long association with the theatre at Bucknell and in New York. Humphrey is the co-CEO of ARTS4ALL.

weekend will consist of dinners, panels and workshops conducted by returning alumni with active careers in the arts. Reunion attendees may tour the Harvey M. Powers Theatre, the Tustin Studio Theatre and newly renovated classrooms. Saturday night features a cabaret and a brunch and business meeting of the Arts Association will take place on Sunday morning. Elaine Williams, Mary Ann Sigler, Betsy Powers and Richard Humphrey organized these events, which are made possible by the generous support of alumni and the Association for the Arts.

Cap and Dagger is a venerable campus organization founded in 1901 as an all-male drama club limited to 12 members. Its sister organization, the female Frill and Frown, also limited to 12 members, was established soon afterward. In 1931, the two groups united under the title of Cap and Dagger. Professor C. Willard Smith of the Department of English was the official faculty adviser to the group and taught the few opened its doors and theatrical production at Bucknell had a permanent home.

Courses in theatre remained within the English Department's offerings, leading first to a minor in theatre and in 1976 to a major in theatre, albeit still then within the Department of English.

Dramatic studies prospered and with the expansion of the staff, the program took on an increasingly professional, as well as scholarly, coloration. Finally, in 1985, with the blessings of the Department of English, a full-fledged, independent Department of Theatre was instituted, with Professor Powers as its chair. In 1987, with the addition of a dance program it became the Department of Theatre and Dance.

In the five decades since Harvey Powers' arrival, the theatre and dance programs at Bucknell have produced a brilliant assemblage of actors, dancers, choreographers, playwrights, designers, directors, producers, technical professionals

Nancy Florent ('86) is currently Manager of Programming for MediaVest Worldwide, in New York—an organization that creates original, client-sponsored, made-for-TV movies. Prior to her work at MediaVest, Florent was the U.S. Personal Assistant to Lord Andrew Lloyd Webber, from 1991-1995. She worked closely on the production of Sunset Boulevard, from its inception through the opening in London, L.A. and Broadway.

George Hatza ('73), majored in English at Bucknell, and after working in the Theatre Department here, went on to earn an MFA from Boston University's School of Fine Arts, studying with Zelda Fichandler, David Wheeler, Maxine Klein and the late Alan Schneider. He has directed and taught acting and theatre history at East Stroudsburg University and Albright College, and theatre and film at Alvernia College. Hatza has worked extensively in summer stock and community theatre, and has been an avid

Penn State, Ohio State, The Ohio Governor's Institute for the Arts and Winthrop University. During and among that he attempted graduate study at Indiana University, spent seven years as a struggling actor in NY (five years in the resident company of the now-defunct PAF Playhouse on Long Island), and earned an MFA in Acting from Penn State.

Adam Zonder ('94) holds an MFA in Technical Direction from UConn. He is the Production Manager of The Hangar Theatre in Ithaca, NY. He is Technical Director at SUNY Albany, and has been Technical Director of over 60 productions with companies such as the Hartford Ballet, Connecticut Opera, The Kitchen Theatre and CBT Productions. Zonder is also a Sound Designer and Engineer. His skills include rigging, advanced carpentry, welding and metalworking, drafting, sound reinforcement design, recording and engineering and electrics.

These are only a few of the panelists who will grace Bucknell this weekend. An incredible wealth of knowledge will flood this campus and it is the reunion of Cap and Dagger that has afforded Bucknell this opportunity—an opportunity that should not be missed. Meningitis: a silent killer

By Cheryl Myers

Dormitory life requires students, whether they like it or not, to live in close proximity with one another, and this perpetually heightens the spread of infectious diseases. Many students are very aware of the common illnesses that sweep through campus dorms. Including sicknesses like colds and stomach viruses, these illnesses take their toll on dormitory residents and then disappear for another few months. However, university students face a much greater threat, the potentially fatal and easily overlooked infectious meningococcal disease, otherwise known as meningitis.

According to the Centers for Disease Control's (CDC) Division of Bacterial and Mycotic Diseases, either a virus or a bacterium can cause meningitis. Viral meningitis is less severe and normally specific treatment is not needed. However, bacterial meningitis can result in brain damage, hearing loss or learning disability.

Both types of meningitis involve an infection of the spinal fluid and of the fluid surrounding the brain. Symptoms listed by the CDC include a high fever, stiff neck and headache. These symptoms may become apparent in a very short period of time, perhaps in a matter of hours, or may take as long as one to two days to arise.

According to the CDC, there are approximately 3,000 cases of meningitis in the United States each year, and despite antibiotic treatment, 10 to 13 percent of these cases result in death. Some forms of bacterial meningitis are contagious, but cannot be contracted through casual contact. Transmitting the infection involves an exchange of respiratory or throat fluids.

Bacterial meningitis can be treated by antibiotics if it is diagnosed early enough by means of a spinal tap. Additionally, there are vaccines available to prevent infection by Streptococcus pneumoniae and Neisseria meningitidis, the leading causes of bacterial meningitis.

In an Oct. 20, 1999 press release from the Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices (ACIP), college first-year students living in dormitories were "found to be at a modestly increased risk of meningococcal disease relative to other persons their age."

The vaccine that the University recently offered to students protects against four of the five most common serogroups caused by N. meningitidis (A, C, Y and W-135). This vaccine is very effective, but does not provide 100 percent protection against the four serogroups. The ACIP recommended that health care providers for college first-year students offer the vaccine and educate students and parents of the seriousness of meningococcal disease.

The American College Health Association states that students exposed to passive or active smoke, bar environments, or excessive alcohol consumption may increase their risk of contracting meningitis. Additionally, anyone with compromised immunity or exposed to a person with a known case of meningitis should be vaccinated. More information can be found on the American College Health Association's web page at www.acha.org/special-prj/men/faq.htm.

The Power of Stereotypes

By Katherine Nowak

A 1997 news release from the American Psychological Association (APA) examined children's television programs for evidence of gender stereotypes and found that male cartoon characters outnumber female characters almost four to one. The portrayal of male cartoons consists of dominance, power and aggression. Female cartoons, besides being underrepresented, are predominated by stereotypical female behaviors—appearance-obsession, boy-craziness, shyness, naïveté and frailty.

"Cartoons tell cultural stories that depict significant differences in the status and capabilities of female and male characters," concluded APA.

Such differences, if accentuated from childhood, can have far-reaching impacts that carry into young adulthood and affect testing ability.

Negative stereotypes have proven to work to the disadvantage of various groups. For example, when female identity is emphasized, women have been shown to do poorly on mathematical tasks.

APA studies indicate that females are susceptible to self-defeat during math examinations as a result of the generalized presumption that females are not as accomplished in mathematics as are men.

Ethnic stereotyping has also been shown to carry consequences. The APA emphasized a group's Asian identity and found that 46 Asian-American female undergraduates performed better than the women in the other test group in which gender was stressed.

The APA concluded that differences in stereotype emphasis resulted in the differences in performance—namely, that Asian Americans are generally perceived as more capable in the area of mathematics than are other ethnic groups.

The Nov. 6 issue of Newsweek reports that recent studies at Princeton University showed ethnicity to impact miniature-golf playing abilities. Forty black and forty white undergraduates participated in the competition. Performance was skewed with either of two stereotypes—"white men can't jump" or "black men can't think"—by informing students that the games were measuring either natural ability or strategic ability.

When groups were told that the test's focus was assessment of natural ability, white students' performance was adversely affected with black students scoring more than four strokes better than whites. When groups were told that strategic ability was being tested, white students scored four strokes better than blacks.

According to Newsweek, Stanford University psychologist Claude Steele believes that stereotypes pervade culture, making certain groups painfully aware of how society views them. This knowledge impacts test and other task performing abilities.

The elderly, minorities and women suffer from generalized impressions. Even listing your gender, age, or race in a pre-test questionnaire can be enough to undermine performance. One of the pressures faced by targeted groups includes the desire to succeed in order to disprove stereotypes. The fear of failure in the face of this challenge, which is not faced by stereotyped individuals, puts additional strain on the performance of stereotyped individuals.

Stereotypes are not outgrown, reminds Newsweek. Senior citizens are commonly thought to be stubborn, forgetful and "senile." They have been shown to perform poorly on tests when such negative descriptions were flashed across a monitor. However, test performance improved when "wise" and "sage" were a part of the subliminal message.

An APA study showed that, contrary to popular belief, the attitudes of elderly people are not unyielding and appear to be significantly malleable.

This study, published in the Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, involved surveying adults of various ages on numerous national issues. After a subject's opinion was given, the experimenters provided additional information on the particular topic. They were curious whether participants would change their minds in light of the new information. People in their middle adult years proved to be the most resistant to change their views—significantly more so than senior citizens.

The unfortunate fact is that stereotypes continue to play a significant role in research and may often skew data. Stereotypes permeate attitudes, behaviors and academics on our campus in a variety of ways. The University's Engineering Department, for example, has a male to female ratio of 75 percent to 25 percent, according to the Engineering Department's web page, www.eng.bucknell.edu. The University's chemistry major sex ratio is 33 males to 22 females.

Surprisingly, this year in the Mathematics Department, there are 37 female majors and 35 male majors.

Newsweek reports that one solution for overcoming stereotypes, is thought-manipulation and deception. For example, telling women that a difficult math test reveals no gender differences will improve women's scores. Although such approaches do not eradicate the existence of stereotypes, they do reduce their power.

If you have experienced deficits in academic, athletic, creative or social pursuits because of stereotypes on our campus, please express them via e-mail in a letter to the editorial section of the newspaper, bucknellian@bucknell.edu.

Dana: The man, The myth, The building

By Matt Albert and Monica Montgomery

It is the first to feel the sun in the morning. Each day, staff prepare the confines to house some of the brightest and creative students on campus. Some know its insides intimately: the layout, the lighting, the smell and the number of steps it takes to walk to the third floor. Here they have nearly every class of their four-year careers, revisiting classrooms and labs semester after semester.

Others see it only from a distance and never find a reason to enter. During the day, it stares down Olin Science, the math majors and the physics majors. At night, the doors do not lock and the labs do not empty. The building that never sleeps always has a handful of students burning their already short wick at both ends.

Dana Engineering is one of the most dynamic buildings on campus. Engineers spend several hours of their day in the second floor computer lab and the wind tunnel in the basement. The building is a microcosm of society where students of each of the five disciplines learn collaboratively in the name of engineering.

We will take a closer look at this brick-enclosed society in the form of a three-part series. The first part will take a look at the history of not only the building, but also a look into the reasons for its construction and the man whose name the building bears, Charles A. Dana. Part two will follow next week, looking at the present state of the building and the engineering program. Part three will conclude the series with a look into the future of Dana Engineering.

Charles A. Dana: engineering benefactor

By Matt Albert and Monica Montgomery

Charles A. Dana was a manufacturer and Chairman of the Board of the Dana Corporation. He was a generous supporter of engineering and science education. A large painting of Dana hangs in the entranceway to the building.

Dana was a native of New York City, attended Columbia University. After four decades, he reorganized and consolidated the Spicer Universal Joint Company into the Dana Corporation. He served three terms in the New York State Assembly.

In an interview in 1959 Dana said, "I found myself with all this money. If you wait until you're dead, it often doesn't get used the way you want it to."

Dana donated money to many small universities including Bucknell, Dartmouth, Dickinson, Colgate and many other colleges in the South. "I think students in the small colleges understand life more. Life at a small college broadens them, and they study harder," Mr. Dana said.

In 1921, construction commenced on what would turn out to be the first of three wings of the new Engineering Building. Operations were led by Professor Frank E. Burpee, superintendent of buildings and grounds for the University. His force of campus workers finished the construction in a short time, laying the final brick in March 1922. Professor of Mechanical Engineering Benjamin Wilson was given the task of installing the necessary equipment that could be utilized by future engineers. The new facilities were outstanding and no changes were needed for the first ten years of the Engineering Building's life. This first wing constitutes a great majority of the present building and featured two skylights located on its roof near the front.

Changes from this point were moderate until the late 1930s when a large renovation was undertaken. The groundbreaking ceremony for this endeavor was held on Sept. 29, 1938. The blueprints called for an addition of two new wings, and the current U-shaped appearance was completed in Sept. 1940.

The new sections were built to hold laboratories, while the central wing housed offices and classrooms. This was also the first time a parking lot was introduced in front of the building.

By the end of World War II, the engineering department offered four of the five disciplines it does today—there was no computer science in 1945—and enrolled a modest number of 110 students. As soldiers returned from overseas, the University's enrollment grew substantially, and some 490 students were enrolled in the engineering department. In this group, there were only six women aspiring to become engineers.

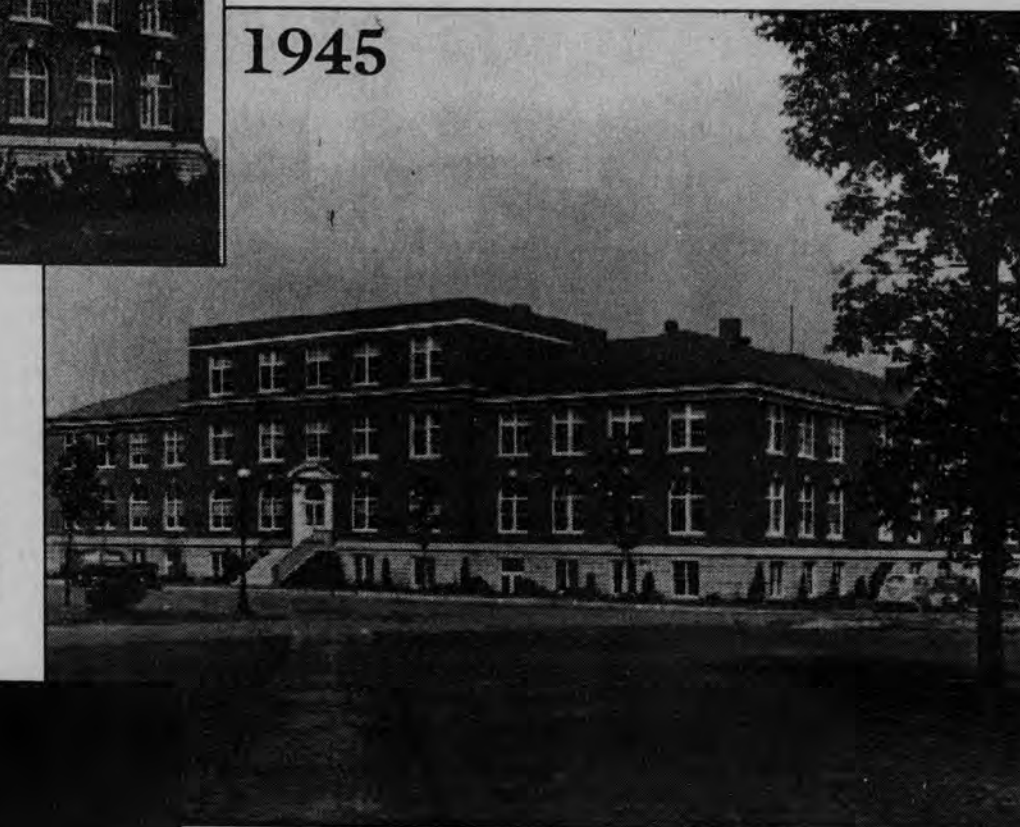

The Engineering Building did not receive its present name until 1960. In that year, the Dana Engineering Building was dubbed to commemorate Charles Anderson Dana.

Evolution of engineering home

By Matt Albert and Monica Montgomery

By the late 1910s, the University had passed all initial tests put before any fledgling institution and could afford to look further into the future. At the start of the 1920s, the campus began to expand from its core of Old Main, currently Roberts Hall. The University purchased the 170-acre plot of farmland owned by George Barron Miller at a cost of $55,000. This mass of land would extend the campus westward toward the future Rooke Chapel and Route 15. In order to provide an independent building where engineers, primarily mechanical engineers, could gather, a section of the newly purchased land was used to construct a new facility.

In 1921, construction commenced on what would turn out to be the first of three wings of the new Engineering Building. Operations were led by Professor Frank E. Burpee, superintendent of buildings and grounds for the University. His force of campus workers finished the construction in a short time, laying the final brick in March 1922. Professor of Mechanical Engineering Benjamin Wilson was given the task of installing the necessary equipment that could be utilized by future engineers. The new facilities were outstanding and no changes were needed for the first ten years of the Engineering Building's life. This first wing constitutes a great majority of the present building and featured two skylights located on its roof near the front.

Changes from this point were moderate until the late 1930s when a large renovation was undertaken. The groundbreaking ceremony for this endeavor was held on Sept. 29, 1938. The blueprints called for an addition of two new wings, and the current U-shaped appearance was completed in Sept. 1940.

The new sections were built to hold laboratories, while the central wing housed offices and classrooms. This was also the first time a parking lot was introduced in front of the building.

By the end of World War II, the engineering department offered four of the five disciplines it does today—there was no computer science in 1945—and enrolled a modest number of 110 students. As soldiers returned from overseas, the University's enrollment grew substantially, and some 490 students were enrolled in the engineering department. In this group, there were only six women aspiring to become engineers.

The Engineering Building did not receive its present name until 1960. In that year, the Dana Engineering Building was dubbed to commemorate Charles Anderson Dana.

Improvements to the building came soon after. In 1961, a new electrical sub-station was installed in the Electrical Engineering department. The following year, a grant from the National Science Foundation and gifts from Trustees Guy Freas and Robert L. Rooke funded the installation of the Freas-Rooke Computing Center on the second floor. This facility was moved 20 years later to the Computer Center Building adjacent to Dana.

In 1965, there were 438 students in the College of Engineering, only two of whom were women.

The final large-scale renovation occurred in 1985 and boasted a price tag of $4.5 million. Ceremonies were held on Oct. 12 to celebrate several new additions, including a new project development lab on the ground floor, a new conference room, a mail and duplicating room, new computing areas, and staff and faculty lounges on the first floor. The roof of the building was also raised, and an entirely new third floor was added to become home to new computing facilities, labs, classrooms and administrative areas. In addition, the Gardner Lecture Hall was dedicated on behalf of Robert A. Gardner, professor of civil engineering for 36 years.

With all the new facilities and resources, the engineering department as a whole had become very appealing to prospective students. By 1985, the department offered Bachelor of Science degrees from the College of Engineering in the five disciplines that exist today. Enrollment had grown to over 600 students, nearly 20 percent of the entire University undergraduate student population. Of the 603 student engineers, almost a quarter of them were women.

Yugoslavia joins United Nations

By Melissa Finkelshtein

A remarkable event occurred this week: the new government of Yugoslavia joined the United Nations. According to The New York Times, Belgrade's role in the international community changed forever following the former Yugoslavia's landmark acceptance into the UN. American ambassador Richard C. Holbrooke said, "This indeed is a historic day for the United Nations, and for the Balkans, for all of Europe, indeed for all of the world. We welcome Yugoslavia as the United Nations' newest member."

Only one short month ago, Yugoslavia was alienated from the United Nations by dictatorial ruler Slobodan Milosevic. It was hard to imagine a time in which this region would be allied with the Western world. Yet, similarly, perhaps a time that Germany would be reunited was once an unconceivable event, as was the dissolution of communism in Eastern Europe. With all of these changes taking place on the global stage, the larger question is raised as to the UN's role in this new century.

The United Nations was established as a collective security alliance in the face of World War II challenges to world stability. The purpose of the UN was to establish and maintain world peace in the international community. Given the developments toward international interdependence in the past half-century, it is not true that the United Nations faces a crossroads as its very purpose is perhaps obsolete? The UN is confronted with the challenge of redefining itself in the global theatre. Membership is now contingent upon a desire to strive for alternative goals.

According to Donald M. Snow and Eugene Brown, authors of Beyond the Water's Edge, the UN's new function is to address emerging issues in an interdependent world.

One of these issues is human rights. Certainly a dedication to human rights has been an objective of the UN from its inception in 1948 with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. But the UN's involvement in this arena has a new and important contemporary role. Foreign policy officials have the ability to focus on human rights, as Cold War threats no longer occupy all policy initiatives. One such effort was the UN Fourth World Conference on Women in 1995 established a Bill of Rights for Women called the Beijing Declaration, complete with a framework for its execution.

Initiatives are being undertaken in the environmental arena as well. The Montreal Treaty of 1987 petitioned UN members to cut back on their usage of CFC's, harmful to the ozone layer. The Treaty acquired half of the members' signatures, and seems to be an effective enterprise in ending the depletion of the ozone layer. Certainly the role of the United Nations faces the challenge of an ever-changing global community, but its effectiveness as a forum for common foreign policy goals of member countries is vital in this new century.

Mbeki questions HIV-AIDS relationship

By Josh Guyan

As the AIDS virus reaches catastrophic levels, most world leaders are coming together to promote awareness and research. Others, however, have demonstrated that they are less trusting of the western medical establishment.

President Thabo Mbeki of South Africa has continually refused to retract statements he has made regarding the link between HIV and AIDS. This refusal has severely hindered his ability to lead his country when it is so needed in the face of a growing epidemic. Speaking to Parliament in September he said, "a virus cannot cause a syndrome," referring to HIV causing AIDS.

President Mbeki has been influenced by a dissident group of scientists led by Peter Duesberg, professor of molecular and cell biology at the University of California at Berkeley. He has believed from the beginning that HIV does not cause AIDS. This group blames everything from poverty to Africa's tropical climate for the AIDS epidemic.

"Much of these claims stem from the fact that AIDS in Africa looks different than in the United States," Bucknell Assistant Professor of Biology Marie Pizzorno said.

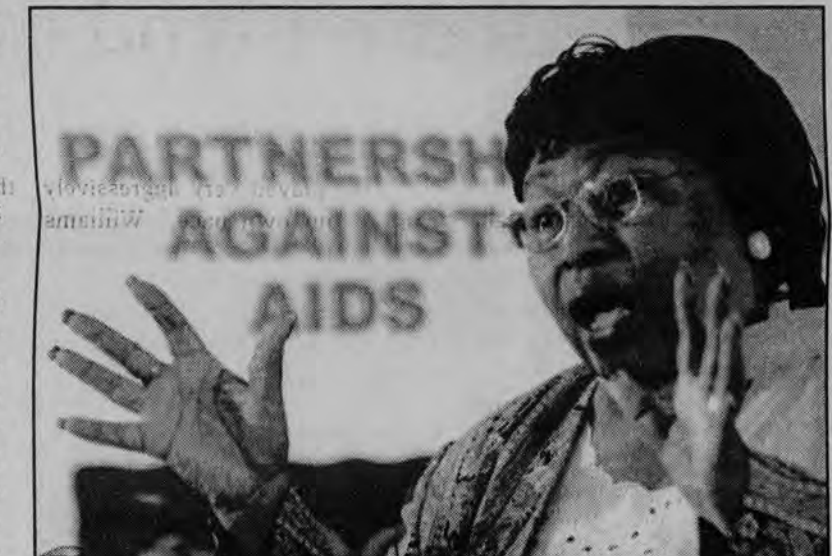

"Victims in Africa lose more weight much quicker than victims in the West." This fact and others has led Mbeki to be hesitant toward Western drugs and treatments.

"I'd say 90 percent of the time patients will see great improvements from these drugs," said Professor Pizzorno. While these treatments are held up, the problem has gotten much worse.

There are now 34.3 million people in the world living with HIV or AIDS. Most of the victims (24.5 million) live in Africa and 4.2 million of those live in South Africa. One in five, or 20 percent, of South African adults have HIV or AIDS. South Africa has more HIV-infected people than any other country.

According to The Washington Post, a report released by the United Nations this summer said, "AIDS will cause early death in as many as one-half of the young adults in the hardest-hit countries of southern Africa..." That would include South Africa. The Post, which has done an entire series on AIDS in Africa, also reports that experts predict AIDS will kill one-fourth of South Africans by 2010.

President Mbeki has questioned the use of AZT and nevirapine, drugs widely used in Western nations to slow the onset or progress of AIDS. AZT can also be used to help pregnant women not pass HIV on to their babies. Scientists and activists have criticized the president because his South African Health Ministry currently opposes distributing AZT to pregnant women.

The Mail and Guardian newspaper reported that President Mbeki told an African National Congress parliamentary caucus that the United States and pharmaceutical companies have conspired to establish a false link between HIV and AIDS to promote the sales of antiretroviral drugs.

"President Mbeki is wrong about the link between HIV and AIDS, but he is right about the U.S. supporting its drug companies," said Bucknell Professor of Economics Geoff Schneider. Schneider said that we have to understand President Mbeki's point of view.

Thabo Mbeki is the second South African president since the end of apartheid, Nelson Mandela's successor. President Mbeki has a deep mistrust of whites. He had been exiled for 30 years while his father was imprisoned with Mandela during apartheid. He is profoundly distrustful of the West and very sensitive to stereotyping of Africans or blacks, according to The Washington Post.

In May President Clinton ordered that South Africa and other African nations be allowed access to the United States market for pharmaceuticals. President Mbeki has announced that five drug manufacturers had offered to lower their prices for African nations.

In July the U.S. Export Finance Agency announced a $1 billion loan every year for the next five years for sub-Saharan African nations to purchase AIDS-related drugs and services from U.S. firms. Critics say the last thing African nations need is more burdensome loans when they are currently trying to negotiate development debt-relief. Critics also argue that requiring African countries to purchase U.S. drugs would still be too expensive. Generic drugs can often be one-tenth the cost.

"The United States hasn't done nearly enough to solve a problem which has been building for years," Professor Schneider said. "The United States is beholden to the interests of its drug companies."

Schneider explained that U.S. taxpayer research studies AIDS and the drug companies use that research to create drugs. Riding on the backs of taxpayers, drug companies have seen the highest profits of any industry in recent years. They would not have the background research to create drugs and make such profits without the government.

This combination of essentially government underwriting of AIDS research and soaring company profits means it would be very easy for the drug companies to reduce prices significantly.

Of course a major first step toward solving this problem could be taken by President Mbeki if he would stop spreading misinformation and admit HIV causes AIDS. His nation needs to mount a massive education campaign to make people aware of the causes of AIDS and it would help if the country's president could get it right first.

This is a serious epidemic in a country which is still reeling from its devastating apartheid regime. President Mbeki should be commended for his involvement in ending apartheid, but he now has to face an even deadlier problem. Florence Ngobele, a South African AIDS sufferer, said, "Did they free us just to watch us die?"

Still waiting for a winner

Sunshine state will ultimately determine next president

Right now there is one certainty, and that is that I lost both bets I made with my mother. Lazio couldn't pull it off, and Bush didn't win by a comfortable margin. While I am down $2, I am still in high spirits. America, I am confident, will soon be relinquished of the seemingly interminable Clinton catatonicism, except for New Yorkers of course. To you I send my condolences. However, the blame falls on you.

The election, though still not over as of late Wednesday, has already been deemed by me (political extraordinaire) as the perfect culmination to this over one yearlong roller coaster campaign. The race so far has had it all. From a supposed Gore "mole" inside the Bush camp sending secret documents, to the alleged subliminal advertising of the Bush campaign, to the back and forth polls, to the most recent DII revelation. These are just a few of the many things that made this race so interesting.

So why not drag it on and on, beyond its scheduled finish? Over time is always more exciting. In almost a media-contrived, Hollywood-esque finale, America was kept up late into the night Tuesday, eyes glued to Dan Rather, waiting. It almost seemed too impossible to be possible for the lead in electoral votes to switch back and forth, until finally, it boiled down to one state.

Bush will win today. The original Florida count had him as the winner, and as we all know they took near if not exactly forever to count the ballots the first time. While the second time is taking even longer, I don't see any reason why it should make a substantial difference. Secondly, the absentee ballots are still rolling in. A great number of these are coming from military servicemen who are abroad. These men are generally republican. A group of individuals who have been labeled, "broken-glass-republicans," may make the difference. This group has been so dubbed as a result of their willingness to walk over broken glass to make their desired change. In Florida, the vast majority of absentee ballots were requested by republicans, and Florida is not a republican state.

Aside from the fact that this was the closest race of my lifetime, it was exhilarating for other reasons as well. While I am confident that tomorrow Bush will be awarded the title in a quasi-OJ jury decision television moment, the mere fact that he is still in contention is extraordinary enough. He, being a republican, was put forward the start at a natural disadvantage considering the fact that he is a republican. He missed out on the powerful endorsements of powerful politicalheavyweights like Cher, Streisand, O'Donnell, Spielberg, Sarandon, Robbins and all of the Baldwins.

The media had an obvious bias that has manifested from their usual subtle coercion to their essentially all out endorsement of Gore. The democratic convention saw an average of three hours more coverage than the republican by most networks. Gore's former campaign adviser being found guilty on all charges for illegal campaign fundraising and questioning about his involvement in allowing Russia to illegally sell arms to Iran were both obviously less news-worthy than Bush saying "trillion" when he meant "billion." They never gave up and did all they could into the last hours. Tuesday night saw Florida being snatched up by Gore somewhat early into the evening, apparently he never once even held a lead. However Bush's comfortable 7-point lead in Ohio was still too close to call. Suddenly, these efforts' failure was personified when Dan Rather had to break it to the nation that Bush had won. He sighed and I rejoiced. I drifted off to dreams of the next four years. The next morning, my pleasant mood was quickly switched back to that of anxiety.

What would a Bush victory mean to America? Contrary to what The Bucknellian stated in last week's edition, the election does have bearing on Wall Street. This would come as a result of Gore's desire for more federal regulation, and Bush's relinquishing of it. Remember the post democratic convention "surge" that Gore experienced around Labor Day. September saw the markets in awful shape. However, Bush climbed his way back up the polls and the markets rallied. Tuesday the final Zogby poll came out and put Gore up by two points, the Dow and NASDAQ fell. Wednesday saw Pfizer, Philip Morris, Merck and Co. and Johnson & Johnson rebound amid prospects of a Bush administration.

Al Goldman, chief market strategist at A.G. Edwards, a brokerage firm in St. Louis stated, "If Gore were considered a sure thing, drug stocks would have already imploded because of the way Gore has ripped big pharmaceutical companies for charging what he calls exorbitant prices for prescription drugs." About a possible Bush victory, "the markets (would) rally, given what many investors might consider Bush's pro-business positions."

If Bush wins today, look for a rally Friday. It probably doesn't come as a surprise that over 60 percent of investors are rallying for Bush. This hair-wire election has been exciting in many respects. If you can appreciate it for the possible benefits that will most likely derive from it, at least appreciate it for the acknowledgement that yes your vote counts, a lot. Ask the broken-glass-republicans.

Field hockey falls in title game

After defeating Fairfield 2-1, Bucknell fell in the title game to Holy Cross, 4-1

By Jennifer Cruickshank

We were upset about the loss. But it wasn't really our game to win. We played well but Holy Cross was just a little bit better this year.
—Meghan Hopping '02

After an up and down season, the Bucknell field hockey team proved why they have competed in the Patriot League Tournament for six out of the last seven years.

With a 2-1 overtime victory over second-seeded Fairfield last Friday afternoon, the third-seeded Bison advanced to the league championship game for the second consecutive season.

Coincidentally, it was a one-goal win over Fairfield that allowed a birth for the Orange and Blue in the Patriot League Tournament held at regular season champion Holy Cross last weekend. The Bison would repeat the victory to gain a second shot at Holy Cross, who had been awarded a controversial win over Bucknell earlier in the season.

Unfortunately for Bucknell, the overtime momentum from the Fairfield victory did not carry through to the championships, as Holy Cross prevailed 4-1.

After a scoreless first half against Fairfield, junior forward Melissa Maher put the Bison on top with an unassisted goal five minutes into the second stanza. The Stags tied the score 1-1 when awarded a penalty stroke with 16:21 left to play, but Maher's scoring was not finished.

In addition to 11 saves from sophomore goalkeeper Sonja Wettergreen, stingy defensive play from junior Monica McCorry and senior tri-captain Katie Yingling sent the game into overtime.

Maher notched the game-winner on a rebound from junior Lauren Campbell's penalty corner shot. With her two goals against the Stags, Maher moved into a tie for seventh place on Bucknell's all-time career goals list with 18.

But more importantly for the junior goal-scorer, the second tally meant an appearance in the league finals.

"The game was really back-and-forth," Maher said. "It could have gone either way, but in the end we just seemed to want it a little bit more."

But Holy Cross crushed Bucknell's wave of momentum, not allowing the Bison to gain any sort of advantage at all.

The majority of the first half was played in the Bison zone, and the Crusaders took a 3-0 lead going into the halftime break. The deficit seemed to be too much for the Orange and Blue as Holy Cross added a fourth tally late in the game.

Junior Dena Ebert avoided the shut-out as she made the final score 4-1 with an unassisted goal in what would turn out to be the last five minutes of Bucknell's 2000 season.

"We were upset about the loss," junior defender Meghan Hopping said. "But it wasn't really our game to win. We played well but Holy Cross was just a little bit better this year."

Despite the loss in the finals, three members of the 2000 Bison squad were noted for their play this season with All-Patriot League Team Honors.

McCorry made her first appearance on the first-team for her solid defensive play, while Maher and Ebert were named to the second-team for their efforts on the offensive side of the field.

"It was sad for this year to come to an end," Yingling said. "But we had a great showing and are all pretty pleased with our performance."

Bucknell athletic teams reach out to community

Members of the Bucknell men's basketball team during a visit to the Geisinger Medical Center.

By Christine Jacoby

Both the men's basketball and football teams have recently made trips to the Janet Weis Children's Hospital of Geisinger Medical Center in Danville, Pennsylvania. The players went from room to room spreading smiles and laughter.

On Sept. 28, five members of the football team and their assistant coach, Joe Tillman, made a trip to the Janet Weis Children's Hospital. Those in attendance included five seniors: fullback Jason Marow, linebacker Chad Marsilio, linebacker Eric Higgins, cornerback Nate Musselman and defensive back Alex Blecksmith.

The group made their way through the halls offering Beanie Babies, Bucknell t-shirts, hats and lots of fun.

"I had a really good time just making the kids smile," Marow said. "It was a great experience that allowed me to brighten their day as well as my own."

Blecksmith expressed similar feelings. "Today made me realize how very fortunate I am to have my health," he said. "The toughest days I go through can never compare to the struggles that these children go through every day."

Certified Childlife Specialist Becky Drumheller said the kids spoke of their visitors long after they had left the hospital that day. "The Bucknell players did a great job with the children, particularly in taking the focus off of the medical situations and directing the interest in the kids themselves."

Six players from the men's basketball team along with head coach, Pat Flannery, and assistant coaches Don Friday, Carl Danzig, and Bryan Goodman also made a visit to the hospital on Wednesday, Nov. 1.

The players took part in a Halloween parade, spreading good cheer and giving out bags of candy along with Bucknell men's basketball schedule posters.

Senior guard Nyambi Nyambi, sophomore forward Boakai Lalugba, and freshmen Ben Slater, Chris Rodgers and Kevin Welsh all took part at the Halloween event.

"I had a really good day spending time with the kids," Nyambi said. "I really enjoy the fact that my being there is something special for them, it touches me to be able to make them smile."

Both teams have made several trips to the Children's Hospital in the past. "Our kids love to get visits from the Bucknell teams," Drumheller said. "The players are always very talkative and do a great job with the them. We get other groups that visit and once they enter the rooms they have a hard time opening up to the kids."

Volleyball can't fend off Lehigh

By Pat Evans

Superman has kryptonite; The Bison volleyball team has Lehigh.

The Orange and Blue have been unbeatable in League play, except when playing the Mountain Hawks who, after this weekend, have beaten Bucknell twice.

Friday the Bison had no problem beating Lafayette 3-0 (15-2, 15-6, 15-3), but Saturday was a different story, as Bucknell struggled the entire match, losing 0-3 (9-15, 9-15, 14-16).

The Lafayette match lasted only 65 minutes as the Bison confidently took care of business. Jen Wrigley '03 and Melanie Gray '02 each recorded seven kills in the contest.

The most notable performer was Whitney Williams '02, whose 25 set assists was good enough to break the single season record in the category.

"We played very aggressively and at our own pace," Williams said of her team's performance against the Leopards.

The Bison needed one more win in order to clinch the top spot in the Patriot League when they traveled to Lehigh. A win would grant Bucknell home court advantage throughout the League tournament.

The Bison couldn't get things together, and were unable to beat the only team in the league that has given them trouble.

Brooke Bader '01 and Shannon Walker '02 each tallied 21 kills in the losing effort. Bader also helped the team defensively with 17 digs.

Williams added to her record with 51 set assists in the match. Playing her usual sound defense was Brandi Trapasso '04, who recorded 24 digs helping to counter the strong Lehigh offense.

The Bison will have to wait until this Saturday to try to guarantee home court advantage in the tournament when they host Colgate. The Red Raiders are currently 8-3 in conference play, and can take over the number one spot by beating Bucknell.

The Bison, who have already beaten Colgate once this season, look to stick to their game plan to ensure the all-important home court advantage.

"We can't fall victim to playing at the other team's speed," Coach Cindy Opalski said.

"If we want to beat Colgate we have to play with confidence," Williams concluded. "People have to step up and prove that we're in first place for a reason."

Last second goal jinxes soccer

Bison must settle for second seed at Patriots after 2-1 loss

By Katie Yingling

Two seconds. Much can happen in that short amount of time. In two seconds it is possible for someone to blink, greet a friend, or smile. In two seconds, it was also possible for the men's soccer team to be stripped of their opportunity to host the Patriot League Tournament.

Eighty-nine minutes and 58 seconds into Bucknell's game against Lehigh this past Saturday, Lehigh's Dan Perciballi placed the ball into the back of the net, claiming a 2-1 victory for Lehigh and upping their record to 11-5-2. Also, Lehigh ultimately stripped the Bison of their once-in-a-decade chance to host the tournament.

While the Bison won't be hosting the tournament next weekend, the loss to Lehigh has not deterred their winning attitude. In fact, it may have actually strengthened it. "Everyone is so focused on beating the only two teams that we lost to this year," Davis said. "We will face Lehigh on Saturday, and if things go as we expect, it will be Lafayette on Sunday."

The Patriot League Tournament will be at Lafayette College this weekend and, as Davis said, the Bison will be up against Lehigh for the second weekend in a row. After this past weekend's loss, however, the upcoming contest will be personal.

"Lehigh is going down," senior Geza Lendvai-Lintner said. "Hopefully they enjoyed their moment last week; it won't be happening again."

Nick Taylor '03 advances the ball upfield.

Heat adjusting to life without Zo

Alonzo Mourning is sidelined for the season.

By Aaron DeRosa

Why does it seem that all retirees move to Florida? Is it for the heat? No... It is the Heat.

The Miami Heat headed into the NBA season looking like a heavy favorite in the East. They had finally picked up a top-notch scorer and defender at the number two, which they desperately needed in Eddie Jones.

In addition, the acquisition of forward Brian Grant from Portland gave All-star Alonzo Mourning some back-up and more comfort under the boards and on defense. Even signing the geriatric Anthony Mason was a good move for them at the small forward position, giving them a team leader and a decent rebounder.

The loss of Alonzo Mourning isn't really something that Pat Riley and Heat fans alike had hoped for their pre-season. Alonzo Mourning was the premiere center of the East, and the only stand-out number five on any competitive team.

Unfortunately, Zo will be out all season with a kidney disorder. However, do not fret, the ailment is similar to one that afflicted San Antonio Spurs forward Sean Elliott last year. Elliott is still playing and there is no reason to think that Zo won't either.

For this year at least, the effects of this malady reach far beyond one small fist-sized organ nestled in the lower back, beyond a single man, and beyond a single team.

In a division that is so strapped for adequate big men as is, there is virtually no one left to compete against their center-centric western rivals. Who plans on defending Shaq? Or Duncan? Who is going to guard Saponis in the post in game one of the NBA Finals? John Amaechi? Duane Causwell? Let's be honest here, a large inanimate steel ladder would stand a better chance than some of the starters in the East.

Despite this setback, Riley remains optimistic about his team's chances. A proposition that seems much easier now that the NBA is granting Miami a $3.88 million medical salary-cap extension so that they will be able to find a replacement for the season.

Right now, all eyes look to Joe

NFL experts' picks

By Justin McCarthy and Ali Ahmed

St. Louis (7-2) at NY Giants (7-2)

Both teams are leading their respective divisions; but while the Rams were expected to, no one expected the Giants to be so dominant. The Giants are winning with their defense—they have the NFC's top rush defense and top scoring defense. Their defense will decide whether they are victorious—for even though they have held eight of their nine opponents to fewer than 20 points, no one yet this season has been able to accomplish such a feat against the offensive machine in St. Louis. However, St. Louis' offense is running on spare parts with RB Marshall Faulk and QB Kurt Warner sidelined with injuries. It is doubtful the Rams' offense will be shut down. However, the Giants' defense certainly has the potential to contain it. The Rams' defense though will not be able to even contain with the running game of Thunder and Lightning. —Justin's pick: Giants 31-24

Since the Rams' losses coincide with the injury of Warner, some people can't wait until he gets back. However, the Rams don't miss Warner—they miss Marshall Faulk. Trent Green can run the Rams' offense well, but it is not the same without Faulk. But with Green at the helm the Rams should still be able to pile up points against the Giants. Holt and Bruce are one of the most dynamic duos in the NFL and should give the Giants fits. With the loss of Faulk, Hakim should get more playing time and—if he can hang on to the ball—should have a major impact. The Giants have a good chance of beating the Rams as long as they can control the clock with Barber and Dayne. Kerry Collins must continue to be solid to give the Giants a chance. At the end, however, I think the Giants are underpowered and can't keep up with the Rams this year. —Ali's pick: Rams 36-24

NY Jets (6-3) at Indianapolis (6-3)

This game will decide who stays on pace with Miami for the lead in the AFC East. The Jets need to contain the passing attack of Manning. And the key to that is to take away his favorite target, Marvin Harrison. If the Jets defensive backs can stay with him (they'll most likely use double coverage), then Manning will need to turn somewhere else. The Colts will need production from their tight end Pollard, especially if Harrison is contained, but more importantly to keep linebacker Bryan Cox busy and off of Manning. The Jets will need to ride the legs of Martin—one of the most under-rated RB's in the league and the game may be decided on how well the Colts' defensive line is able to control the line of scrimmage. —Justin's pick: Colts 27-23

It looks like the momentum of the Jets is finally starting to wear off. Their offense is not scoring enough points and the defense is giving up big plays, especially in the secondary. The Jets do have a number of nice young players and they need to get some more playing time to see if they can do something. But the Jets seem like they need a spark. Indianapolis seems to play great one week, with their offense covering for their defense, and then the next week their defense exposes them—as they did last week when the opposing offense ate up the whole clock. And that was against the dismal Bears' offense; this week just may be the week where the offense covers the defense, but watch out for Curtis Martin. He might have a big day and the Colts may see it need to draft a couple of defensive tackles to help middle linebacker Rob Morris. —Ali's pick: Colts 33-27

Oakland (8-1) at Denver (5-4)

The Broncos dealt Oakland their only loss of the season and have only gotten better with a fully recovered Davis now in the backfield (he ran for 100 yards for the first time since Super Bowl XXXIII last week). The Raiders have their own formidable rushing attack in Wheatley and Kaufman and actually have the NFL's No. 1 ground game. Gannon has been on fire lately, but will need to be wary of a defense that leads the league in interceptions. With Davis running the ball effectively again, Griese can only be more of a threat. The key to this game will be the Broncos' passing game; if Griese is effective then Davis will have a field day with the Raiders' defensive line. Both teams will need their defenses to win this game against two very potent offenses. —Justin's pick: Broncos 30-24

Okay, Oakland is on fire. Gannon is playing clutch football and the defense is playing well enough to win a lot of games. But a lot of those games have been very close, and Gannon can't keep bringing them back. This week, though, they might not have to come back against a suspect Denver defense. However, Shanahan is a very successful coach against the Raiders, and if the Raiders don't come out and play a solid game they will be in trouble. Denver is one of the most complete offenses in the NFL, as they have a solid QB and a great running game plus quality players at receiver and tight end. However, their defense is questionable and they are going against a strong Raiders' defense. This game will showcase one of the biggest rivalries ever, but it might not be as close as people want. —Ali's pick: Raiders 31-24

Baltimore (6-4) at Tennessee (8-1)

This is a game between two defensive powerhouses; however the Titans have an offense to back theirs up. The Ravens have allowed only five TD's over their past seven games, and they will test Eddie George with the top run defense and top overall defense in the NFL, as they also have not allowed a 100 yard rusher in 27 consecutive games. George will certainly challenge the Ravens defense, as he is second in the AFC in rushing and has already surpassed 1,000 yards this season. Even if the Ravens halt George they will not be able to stop McNair as well. However, the Titans will only need minimal offensive production considering the state of the Ravens offense (they scored a TD last week for the first time in six games) and the play of their own defense. —Justin's pick: Titans 17-9

In each of the past few weeks, a big team has been going down in an upset. I think that this week that team is the Titans. I know Baltimore has not been able to score except against the Bengals—which does not count—but they could somehow get it going against the Titans. Jamal Lewis might turn out to be the best rookie in the second half of the season, especially with the Ravens' improving offensive line. Also, with weapons like Shannon Sharpe and Travis Taylor, only the quarterback will need to make plays for the Ravens to score. Of course that has been a problem recently but even Banks can do well sometimes. Tennessee will have a very hard time running against the Ravens, and I think McNair won't be able to carry the team this time. —Ali's pick: Ravens 17-16

Philadelphia (6-4) at Pittsburgh (5-4)

The Steelers' defense ranks number one in points allowed a game, at 10.3, and has not allowed a touchdown in 20 consecutive quarters of play. Their defense should not have a problem with an offense led by inexperienced McNabb. Since Staley went out with an injury, the Eagles' offense has sputtered, and McNabb is currently the team's leading rusher with just 377 yards. To stop McNabb the Steelers' defense needs to pressure him into making mistakes both in the air and on the ground. The Eagles will need to hope that Stewart does not play well so that they can instead focus only on Bettis. If Stewart establishes himself, then Bettis should be able to easily control the line of scrimmage and run through Philly's front seven. —Justin's pick: Steelers 20-9

The battle of Pennsylvania will be a slow and ugly one. Both teams should have trouble scoring and the game will come down to a couple of big drives and quick, key plays. The Steelers defense is proving to be dominant again, and its streak of quarters without a touchdown allowed should continue against an unbalanced Eagles attack. With the loss of Staley, there will be enormous pressure on McNabb and his primary target, Charles Johnson, who should be pumped up to have a big game against his former team. They key will be the Eagles' offensive line and whether it can give McNabb time to make plays. For the Steelers, stopping the run should not be difficult as they must put as much pressure on McNabb as possible. Blitzing from different angles is crucial, and Gideon or Porter will have to have a big day against a very able Eagles line. On offense the Steelers must ride the bus and let Kordell roam more. —Ali's pick: Steelers 23-9

Strawberry pleads for yet another chance

By Rob Schmicker

The last couple weeks of my life have been downhill. I basically want to die... At this time I would rather just go ahead and kill myself.

Darryl Strawberry admitted in court on Friday, "Life hasn't been worth living for me, that's the honest truth."

And so we have another twist to the never-ending saga of Strawberry, the one-time king of New York baseball.

Drafted in 1980, Strawberry went on to play eight seasons with the New York Mets before his career started to spiral downwards. In his first nine years, Strawberry never hit less than 25 home runs (which was considered good back in the eighties) and to this day, he still holds the Mets franchise record with 252 home runs. Even as late as 1999, Derek Jeter praised Strawberry by saying that he was "a man who has some of the purest baseball talent I've seen."

He was a quiet star on the 1986 World Series winning team, and two years later he led the league in home runs. At that time, things couldn't have been any better for Strawberry. But outside the game, Strawberry started to have problems. In early 1987, his wife filed for legal separation after she accused him of breaking her nose. Two years later, they became officially divorced, and on January 26, 1990, Strawberry was arrested for alleged assault on his former wife. A week later, Strawberry checked himself into an alcohol rehabilitation center. After the 1990 season, his most productive one as a member of the Mets (37 home runs, 108 RBI's), he signed with Los Angeles, hoping to start over again.

In his first season with the Dodgers, he was named to the All-Star game but his success only lasted that one season. The following two years he played a total of 87 games, and off the field had numerous incidents. He was accused of assaulting his new girlfriend and is said to have toyed with the idea of suicide, as early as September 1993.

The following year he checked into the Betty Ford Center and was indicted on a drug charge in early December. In 1995 he was suspended from baseball for 60 days for testing positive for cocaine. The Yankees took a chance and signed him later in the year. Since then, Strawberry has been suspended from baseball twice, diagnosed with colon cancer and charged with several felonies including failure to pay child support, possession of cocaine and soliciting a prostitute—all during three different stints with the Yankees.

Last month, Strawberry was thrown in jail for violating his parole, and during that time he told the judge that he stopped his chemotherapy treatments, because they make him so sick that he can't handle it while behind bars. So he is asking to be released because, as he put it, "I'm not a danger to society. I've never harmed nobody; I never will." Is this a good enough of a basis to be released? You make the call.

I sympathize with Darryl because fighting cancer is hard enough, but doing it while in jail must be terribly difficult. But the obvious reaction is that maybe he shouldn't have gotten himself into trouble in the first place. When news broke that he had been diagnosed with colon cancer in 1998, there was an overwhelming amount of support and sympathy given to Strawberry from his fans, teammates, and even media. He had successful surgery to remove the tumor, but only a week later learned he would have to undergo chemotherapy treatment since it had indeed spread to his lymph nodes.

At that point Strawberry should have turned his act around as he was given another shot at life. Even though the cancer had spread, the chemotherapy gave him an excellent chance to beat it altogether. He was even back in time to celebrate with his Yankee teammates who had just won the World Series.

But like so many others, Strawberry blew it, and the following year he was charged with possession of cocaine and soliciting a prostitute. The media and the rest of America started to get fed up with Strawberry. But still, the Yankees gave him another shot, as his off-the-field problems could be overlooked if he was able to do his job and help the team win.

Shooting guard has been well traveled of late. Fighting off playing time trouble with Pat Riley in L.A., he hopes to regain the respect he once demanded in New York.

Can Shawn Kemp be the missing piece to the Blazers dominating team? With his fast break style and nifty finishing skills, Kemp might prove to be the spark that sends the Blazers to the top.

Definitely Ewing. Being a long time veteran of the Knicks and having been unappreciated in NY lately, Ewing will end the long time absence of a decent center in Seattle! - Roger Huang Lee '04

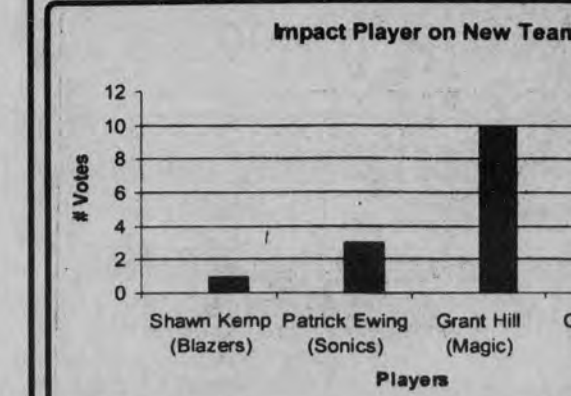

People seem to have forgotten the dominance that Glen Rice displayed with Charlotte before being traded to LA, finishing among the leagues top five scorers at least one year. Last year, he played a pivotal role in helping the Lakers to the championship with clutch fourth quarter 3-point shooting. Permisohn era coming to a close

By Brian Klotz

It has often been said of the New York Yankees and their success in recent World Series history that they have a group of guys that are team players. They work well together, and when an individual comes through, the team follows. Bucknell's water polo team acts in much the same way.

One senior, Kevin Permisohn, is leading the team in his third year as team captain for the Bison. Permisohn is all about the team, and he shows it in the way he plays. His leadership has paced the Bison to become a nationally-competitive team.

Permisohn started playing water polo at the young age of eleven, but was in the pool swimming at the even younger age of four. His involvement in swimming was the principle reason he began to play water polo.

Co-captain Kevin Permisohn has been a consistent All-League defender for the Bison, while maintaining a 3.4 GPA.

achivement. During his freshman year, The Bucknellian named him rookie of the year, and every year he has been an All-Conference performer and Academic All-American. But his latest accomplishment has been perhaps his proudest.

Last week, Permisohn moved into second all-time for Bucknell in assists. "I would have to say that the high point of my career has been the assists," he said. "My ability to see the field of play allows other players to excel."

Teammate James Miente '01 praised Permisohn's ability and work ethic. "All around, Kevin is probably the best player we have," Miente said. "He does the little things, and sees the pool better than anyone I have ever played with."

Permisohn has held the position of team captain for the past three years and sees his role as an important one. "I have always felt that I have the most commitment to the team," Permisohn said. "I try my best to motivate the team when things don't seem to go our way and work extra hard to keep the respect of the other players."

Coach John Ziegler has seen Permisohn's leadership as a big help to ease his transition into his first year of coaching water polo at Bucknell.

"Kevin has probably been one of the best leaders this program has ever had," Ziegler said. "I would describe him as the type of individual who holds a kind of secondary coaching role. He communicates strategy to the players and leads most this year by example."

Underclassmen look up to Permisohn when he plays. "He is always going all out when he is in the water, whether in practice or games," Jamie Saelele '04 said. "He's pulled me aside a couple of times when he sees that I am having problems. He can see what the freshman are going through."

Permisohn expresses satisfaction with this year's season for himself and the team. "I've accomplished my personal goals. I think I have taken my play to the next level, and the team has qualified for Eastern Championships," Permisohn said. "But, win or lose, I know we come out ahead as long as I always put in my best effort all the time."

Throughout his years at Bucknell, Permisohn's water polo career has been littered with pole, go into Civil Engineering, and be a good distance from home. I applied early decision here and got in."

During his freshman year, Permisohn found the individual attention offered by Bucknell as very helpful to his academic goals. "You don't feel like a number here, and you feel like you can make an impact and not get lost in the crowd," he said.

Permisohn puts a great deal of emphasis on his academics. Sometimes, he admits, too much, but the balance between studies and athletics hasn't been too hard to attain. He attributes much of his 3.4 GPA to study habits learned through his involvement in water polo.

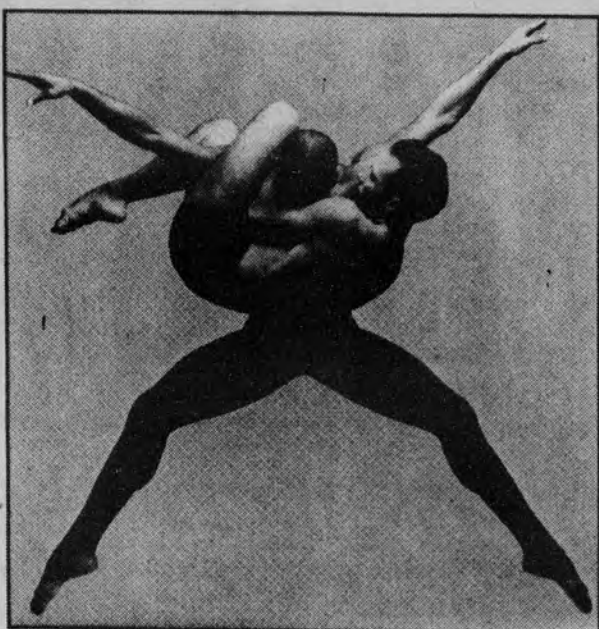

"Athletics give you structure," Permisohn said. "It gives you a perspective on how to get things done."

Through his years at Bucknell, Permisohn's water polo career has been littered with Women's soccer lone senior has led Bison to 2000 success

By Molly Goeller

The Bucknell women's soccer team just ended their 2000 season this past weekend in the Patriot League Tournament. Though the tournament did not go as they had been hoping, the Bucknell women were able to walk away from their season with a proud sense of accomplishment.

Helping to lead that season was senior tri-captain, Kristen Erb. Erb began her collegiate soccer play midway through her sophomore year, after playing basketball for Bucknell throughout her freshman year. Immediately, Erb actively dedicated herself to becoming part of the soccer team. She worked hard at practice and was rewarded by her significant participation in the games.

Since joining the team in 1998, Erb has seen continuous improvement and has become a valued and irreplaceable asset to the soccer program. "Kristen has definitely improved as a player these last few years," junior tri-captain Ali Chandler said. "She is such a strong part of our midfield this year and has gotten much more aggressive."

But Erb does more than just play great soccer. She inspires and encourages the people all around her through her intense determination and work ethic. "Kristen has such a wonderful attitude, both on and off the field," Chandler said. "She is positive and inspiring through her work ethic and her love for the game. She is an incredible role model to all of the players."

The most unique thing about Erb's participation in the soccer program is that she is the only senior on the Bison's 2000 team. While this lack of fellow classmates may appear to have challenged both the team and Erb, it has done just the opposite.

"I think that it might have been difficult for Kristen when she first joined the team her sophomore year," junior tri-captain Anna Hall said, "but not anymore. As a team we have consciously tried to eliminate class barriers as much as we can, and therefore she has become a big part of all of the classes."

Being the lone senior on the team, Erb is looked upon by her fellow teammates for guidance and leadership. "At first I was a little nervous about coming into senior year with the dual responsibilities of being a senior and a captain," Erb said.

"But as the season progressed, I found that as long as I respected my teammates, they would respect me."

Erb is saddened by the thought of leaving behind her team, but has total confidence in the potential of the women. The annual senior day for all soccer players was very emotional for Erb and put everything into perspective for her.

As a senior, it is hard for her to say goodbye to something that she has known and loved for so long, but Erb sees a bright future for this young team. Erb will be sorely missed next season, as she has gained the affection of all her teammates.

"She looks out for everyone and leads 100 percent by example," Hall said. "I think that she has been a great captain and I will miss her attitude and perspective during practices next year. All the girls just love her and think the world of her."

Senior tri-captain Kristen Erb solidified the Bison midfield.

Freestyle events carry swimmers

By Carmen Mauriello

The Bison men's and women's swimming teams bounced back from their setbacks to Army on Oct. 26 to defeat Drexel last Saturday, 128-113 and 131-97 respectively.

Both teams' victories were powered by their dominance in the freestyle events. The men's team recorded five first-place finishes in the freestyle events while the women captured four, highlighted by both teams' 400-yard freestyle teams remaining undefeated on the season.

Chris Neary '02 led the men's charge in the freestyle events, remaining unbeaten in the 50-yard freestyle with a time of 21.92.

Freshmen Peter Garvin and Matt Halliwell claimed victories in the 100-yard freestyle and 1000-yard freestyle, respectively, in times of 48.60 and 10:09.68. Bill Orendorf '01 took the 500-yard freestyle, clocking in at 4:57.25.

The Bison 400-yard freestyle relay team rounded out the team's success in the freestyle events by taking first place with a time of 3:13.40.

"We're a deep team in the freestyle events," head coach Jerry Foley said. "There aren't many teams that we'll go against that can match our depth there."

The freshmen quartet of Garvin, Halliwell, Harrigan and Sheehan provided the Bison four individual victories. Foley was pleasantly surprised with their performance, recognizing that they've developed into key contributors.

"It was a good win that helped get our spirits up after Army," Michael Guskey '03 said. "Drexel had a strong team and the win gave us a boost."

On the women's side, double-winner Abby Weaver '02 set the pace for the team's victory. Weaver won the 100-yard freestyle with a time of 54.76, while she touched first in the 200-yard individual medley at 2:12.66.

Bucknell's other individual freestyle winners were Anna Sommers '04 and Megan Jones '01. Sommers captured the 50-yard freestyle in a time of 25.45, while Jones clocked in at 2:01.11 to win the 200-yard freestyle.

Sophomore Darby Golino finished first for the Bison in the 200-yard backstroke in a time of 2:12.47, while Barbara Morgan '02 won the 200-yard breaststroke in 2:32.09.

Weaver attributed the team's better results in the individual events to an improvement in finishing races.

"We had better finishes against Drexel," Weaver said. "We got to the wall quicker than we did against Army."

The women also excelled in the relay events, as both their 400-yard freestyle relay and 400-yard medley relay were victorious.

"We were pushed in the 400-yard freestyle, but we're still undefeated there this year," Foley said. "It's our goal for both these men's and women's relay teams to go undefeated all year."

Another notable performer was freshman diver Sarah Petcavage. She finished second in the one-meter diving event with a score of 215.475, and in the process qualified for ECACs. Petcavage is the first diver under the guidance of Diving Coach Errol Carter to achieve ECAC qualifying scores.

"(Petcavage's success) is a great tribute to coach Carter's efforts," Foley said. "He's been very patient and had worked hard for four years to get someone to that level."

Both teams now stand at 2-1 and will host Towson this Saturday at 11:00 a.m.

"Our teams will be very motivated in trying to avenge losses from last year," Foley said. "We think that we can beat them, but it's not going to be easy."

Bucknell crew teams take on the Occoquan

By Jeff Bolle

This past Saturday the Bucknell crew team traveled to Fairfax Station, Va. to face off against 25 other crews at the Head of the Occoquan. The grueling 3.2-mile course twists its way through the Occoquan reservoir.

The novice women's boats got their first taste of racing this season and fared well in a highly competitive field in which ten of the 27 boats finished within a minute of each other. Finishing in a time of 18:57, the women's "B" boat, with Katie Tarka '04, Karen Shuyler '04, Caroline Myers '04, Meggie Coates '04, Lisa Baranik '04, Angel Gabler '04, Emily Smith '04, Kate Boschen '04 and coxswain Dare Felchin '04, placed ninth.

The "A" boat was close behind, finishing with a time of 19:02 and including rowers Anna Larson '04, Nora Abdullah '03, Becca Newman '04, Maggie Cook '03, Lynn Hootman '04, Jacquelyn Mitchell '04, Joan Wendler '04, Katie Barriera '04 and coxswain Cristina Meng '04.

The novice men's eight, comprised of freshmen Mark Harris, Will Hart, Kyle Goodwin, Chuck Dickhart, Raf Crowley, Brian Prins, Ryan Sexton, Matt Albrecht and cox Justin Faden, taking the experience they gained last weekend had another strong performance finishing seventh with a time of 16:27.

Their race was especially competitive, finishing 45 seconds behind first place. As their experience and strength grow, these men will be a considerable force against other crews in the upcoming races and in the spring season.

The varsity women, Jill Harrington '04, Jessie Smith '01, Steph Sturm '01, Katie Barreira '04 and cox Nicole Tomlin '04, in their first race of the season finished 20th due to a 30-second penalty. These women continue to work on their strength and technique and are hoping to make a good showing next weekend.

The varsity lightweight four, Jeremy Urban '02, Trevor Gibson '03, Ben Pfeiffer '03, Brian Albert '03 and coxswain Nikhil Mervon '03, had another strong performance in a race without a separate class for lightweight.

presented for us," Zeigler concluded. "We were in a great position to upset Navy at home, and I was surprised that we did not put forth a better effort."

Looking to the Eastern Championships next weekend, the Bison continue to strengthen offensive play and work on different defensive strategies.

Right now Zeigler and the men aim to put together a solid four-quarter game and hope to meet up with season rivals Princeton and Navy. With two more weeks of hard work and a full season of strong play under its belt, the Bucknell men's water polo team has nowhere to go but up.

play up to their potential against a talented Navy team. The first quarter was not too damaging, as BU only trailed 0-1 going into the second.

The second and third quarters proved to be the indicators of the game's outcome, however, and Navy outscored the Bison 9-3 in the second and third alone.

The teams traded three goals in the final quarter, but Navy had already secured the lead. They came away with a 13-6 victory and BU automatically took third place at the tournament.

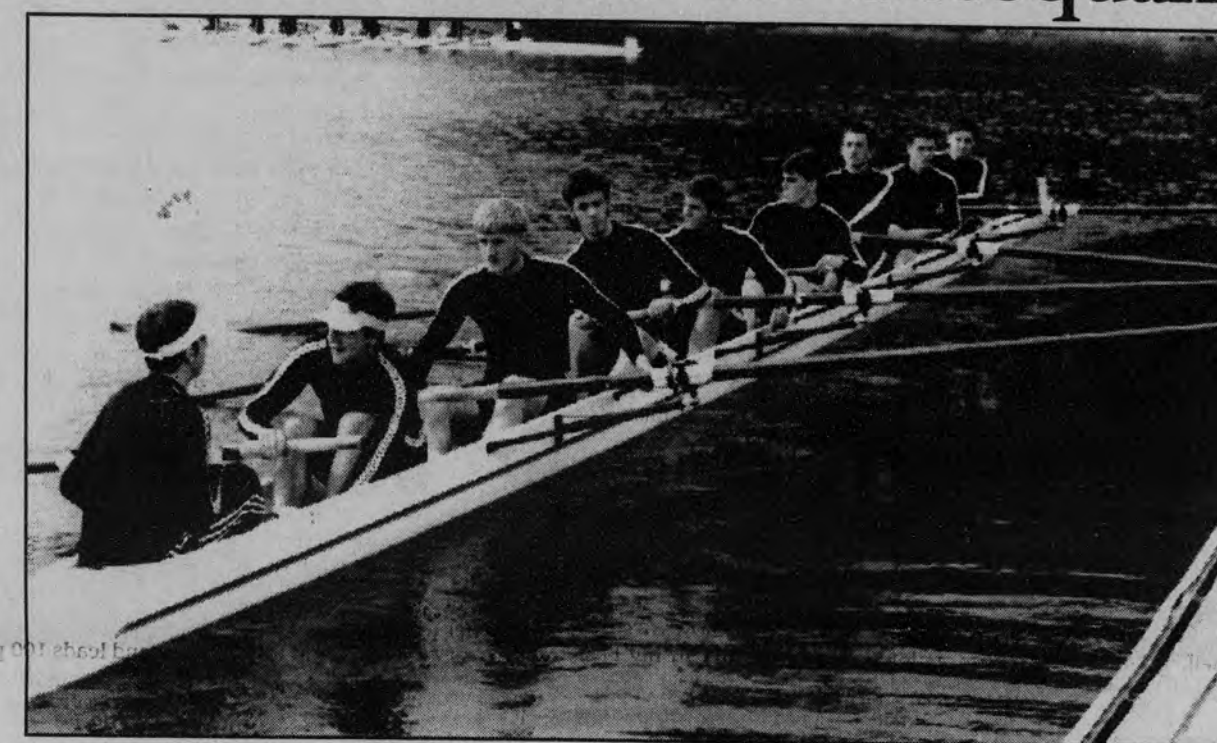

"Defensively, we came out strong," Zeigler said. "But we were of reach for the Bison. But don't expect the Bison to roll over and forget about the final two games of the season."

"We have seniors on this team, and we still want them to go out 8-3," Powell said. Coach Gadd made it clear that his team is still intent on winning. "We're going to do the things that we have to do to win."

If there was one definite upside to this game, it was that Powell was able to return from two weeks off and still carry the ball 34 times for a total of 74 yards on the ground. "I felt that I was able to come back and play the same way that I started the season," Powell said.

Bucknell is on the road again this weekend, as they travel down to Towson to take on another Patriot League opponent. Pride is what is at stake here—and hopes of an 8-3 season. The Bison need to win this game to keep those hopes alive.

Peace frogs wrap up fall campaign

The Peace Frogs won back-to-back fall league titles.

By Betsy Anderson

After qualifying for the National Competition last spring, the Bucknell women's ultimate frisbee team, the Peace Frogs, were looking forward to a fall season of recruitment to replace three key seniors from last year. There was a sizable turnout of new players at the beginning of the season and the Peace Frogs came out in force in their first tournament at Penn State University, winning all four games. As the season progressed, a strong group of new players emerged as valuable additions to the team.

"The veteran players not only taught us the fundamentals of Ultimate, but also the spirit of the game," stated freshmen Julie Gabrielli and Lindsey Warfel. In September, the Frogs traveled to Philadelphia for the Sectionals competition where they qualified for the Regional tournament. A few weeks later, the Peace Frogs hosted their first ever women's tournament at Bucknell with the University of Delaware, Princeton and Salisbury State in attendance.

As the season was winding to a close, the Peace Frogs traveled with the Bucknell men's ultimate frisbee team, the Mudsharks, to Rochester, N.Y. for the annual Halloween tournament. After going undefeated on the first day of tournament play, the Frogs played down the competition on the second day to win the title.

Last weekend, the Frogs ended their fall season as defending champions of the Chesapeake Fall College Championships at the Naval Academy in Annapolis, Maryland. "We knew that the competition would be tough, but we were ready to play with intensity in order to defend our title," sophomore Melanie Novak said.

Bucknell began the day with victories over George Washington University and the University of Virginia. Then the team met American University in the semi-finals and advanced to the finals, where they upset Salisbury State 15-4. "We proved that we are a force to be reckoned with," senior Kathy Kennedy said.

The Peace Frogs have high expectations for the upcoming spring season where they will be competing for the ultimate reward of returning to the Nationals competition in May.

McSorley—lethal enforcer

An enforcer's life is an enchanted thing. It is certainly unlike anything else in hockey, and really, it bears little resemblance to any other job description in the entire sports world.

For those of you who don't know, enforcers are good at one thing and one thing only: they beat the hell out of people.

We've all seen enforcers; everyone grew up with one of these kids. He was the one who could hit a ball to the moon, but couldn't remember if he batted right or left handed. He's the kid parents would see out their kitchen window clumsily lurching toward the end-zone tree with a football and half the neighborhood hanging off his arms and legs.

The other thing about enforcers is that they don't pretend to be able to do anything else. They can't score goals because they are always using their sticks to hook, slash, trip and cross check other players. They usually can't make a pass within several yards of their target. Honestly, a lot of these guys have trouble stopping after they skate fast—worse though, a lot of them have trouble skating.

But that's okay with them. Their job is not so much about playing hockey as it is about the opportunity to bloody someone's face. Neutral zone traps and fore-checking can be taught, but yanking a sweater over a guy's head and pounding him back into yesterday is something that only comes naturally.

That's the school of thought 17-year veteran enforcer Marty McSorley always subscribed to, until last year at least.

With 2.7 seconds left in a game against Vancouver on February 21, McSorley skated behind Donald Brashear and swung his stick into the right side of Brashear's temple. Replays of the incident show just how vicious the attack was—Brashear crumpling to the ice, his head slamming against the surface and his helmet pushed forward over his eyes. He was taken off the ice lying unconscious on a stretcher.

Commissioner Gary Bettman wasted no time in punishing McSorley, whose suspension ran through the remainder of last season. Shortly after that however, the Crown prosecutor's office in Vancouver launched its own investigation on McSorley, which eventually led to his arrest. Although he was actually convicted last month in a Canadian Court of assault with a weapon, he will serve no jail time.

McSorley says all he wanted to do to Brashear was tap his shoulder and instigate a fight. Kind of a weak excuse considering the extreme difficulty of instigating a fight against someone who's unconscious. He contends to this day that his "attack" on Brashear was anything but, and the subsequent suspension and conviction was unnecessary.

You probably couldn't have found a more disgruntled and defeated man than McSorley on Tuesday. Bettman's final chapter to this saga was the extension of McSorley's suspension until February 20, 2001, a full year after the original incident. It is the longest suspension ever handed down in the NHL, and is meant to serve additionally as an example to other players about the league's intolerance in matters like this.

As far as McSorley goes, the more he whines about the consequences, the more convinced I am that he deserves every bit of it.

Coaches have sent players out on the ice to pick a fight before—McSorley was probably instructed by former Boston Bruins head coach Pat Burns to instigate a fight with Brashear. Boston goaltender Byron Dafe had been injured earlier in the game when a Vancouver player landed on his leg in the crease, forcing Dafe out of the game. That's why Burns sent his star goal on out on the ice so late in the game—to get redemption.

McSorley has over 3700 career penalty minutes, the third highest all-time. That's over 60 hours—the Amish could raise a barn in the time McSorley has been sitting in penalty boxes around the league. The point is that McSorley wasn't born yesterday; after 17 years in the league he knows exactly what he can get away with and what he can't. When and where he decided maliciously slashing someone's head hard enough to knock them out cold was appropriate, I don't know.

It is true that violence has long been a staple of hockey—that's part of what makes it so entertaining. The NHL says it doesn't necessarily condone on-ice violence, but it plainly markets aggression in its advertisements.

The beauty of hockey has always been that players have demonstrated good judgment in monitoring the level and intensity of violence on the ice. In a game that revolves around toughness, fistfights and body checks, some standard of respect must be maintained.

Although McSorley was rightfully lambasted by the media and the league, the NHL has suffered without a doubt as well. Lately people have been ruthless in questioning the legitimacy and necessity of violence in games—and how much control referees and league officials actually have over the players.

To McSorley, he says he was only doing his job, which puts the NHL in an even worse position. It then seems like this type of action, which could and has caused serious injury, is being encouraged during games. The best thing McSorley can do is tell people that this was his error, and not pass off the blame.

He owes a debt to the NHL for the embarrassment that he has become—he should consider himself lucky just to be sitting at home suspended right now.

If it were up to me, McSorley would be serving his punishment in a different kind of penalty box—a jail cell.

Bison squander postseason hopes

Holy Cross gets second chance at field goal after penalty and drops Bison 10-9

By Cory Nadler

Devastated.

That word would hardly be enough to describe the way the Bison felt about their 10-9 loss to Holy Cross on Saturday. In a game that consisted of five field goal attempts, the only two that really mattered were the last two.

The first of which was attempted from 44 yards out, and Holy Cross missed badly, but there were flags on the play. Bucknell was called for roughing the kicker and Holy Cross got another chance, this time from five yards closer. And, the Crusaders were able to knock through a 39-yard field goal with no time left on the clock to win the game.

The penalty came in a situation where a Bucknell player was going hard for the ball, and hit the kicker at the end of the play.

"We hit the Holy Cross kicker," Head Coach Tom Gadd said. "But you can't get on our kid for playing hard."

Gadd believed that there were many other calls throughout the game that may have been questionable, and these calls had an influence on the outcome of the game as well. "There were other things called in the game that allowed it to get to that point," Gadd said.

The beginning of the game consisted of two back-to-back scoring drives. On their opening drive, the Crusaders engineered a 12-play drive that spanned 65 yards and culminated in a four yard touchdown run. Before the Bison offense had even touched the ball, they found themselves down by seven points.

But after the first drive the Bison defense was able to shut down the Crusaders for the remainder of the game until the final play. After the first drive, we settled down as a defense, and played well for the rest of the game," linebacker Chad Marsilio '01 said.

The Bison were able to bounce back with a scoring drive of their own, moving the ball 51 yards in 15 plays. The drive stalled and the Bison offense had to settle for the first of three field goals on the day; this would not be the last time that the Bison would have a first and goal situation and not make it into the end zone.

"We just came out flat," running back Jabu Powell '02 said. "We didn't play to our potential. Saturday, we did not play like Bucknell."

Coach Gadd expressed disappointment about his team's offensive drought. "We have lost our confidence on offense," Gadd said. "We are not playing very well on offense right now, and as a team we are going to have to get it back."

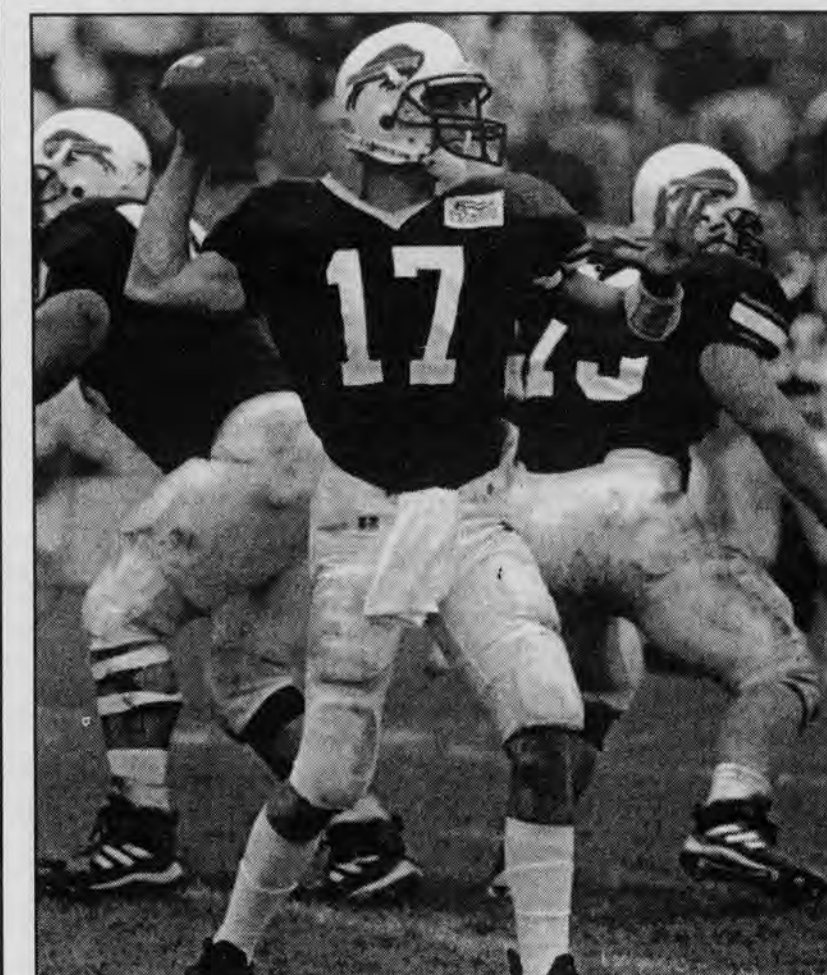

Both offenses went silent for the remainder of the first half and the majority of the third quarter, but Bucknell began the scoring again near the end of the third period. After an interception by Dave Evans '01, the Bison had first and goal on the Holy Cross eight-yard line.

They were only able to move the ball to the three yard line, and actually ended up losing yardage before having to kick a 27 yard field goal to cut the Holy Cross lead to 7-6.

When Holy Cross got the ball back, its offense fumbled at its own 22 yard line and the Bison recovered. Once again, Bucknell was only able to move the ball 15 yards, and had to settle for their third field goal of the game, which Chris Lundberg '03 knocked in from 23 yards out.

Bucknell now took its first lead of the game at 9-7 with more than 13 minutes remaining in the game. If it were not for the consistency of Lundberg, the Bison would not have even had a chance to win this game. "I felt that he would become a dependable kicker, and he proved that Saturday," Gadd said.

Women fall to Holy Cross 1-0 to end season

By Chuck Vicente

The Bucknell women's soccer team was eliminated from the Patriot League Tournament this past weekend by Holy Cross, but its members earned several individual league honors for their season performance.

Hosted at Colgate, all four teams competing were capable of winning the title, which made for some exciting soccer.

Holy Cross unfortunately dominated the game against Bucknell. They kept constant pressure on the Bison defense and dictated most of the play.

"We struggled to be consistent in key positions. Holy Cross played for 90 minutes with the mentality that they wanted to win, not just our game, but the whole tournament," said Head Coach Chrissy Findlay.

Holy Cross outshot Bucknell 9-2 in the first half, and was able to capitalize on a corner kick. Colleen Crush headed the ball in then net giving the Crusaders a 1-0 lead.

In the second half Holy Cross kept its momentum up, blasting 19 shots at goal while Laurie Purse '03. Purse was able to hold her ground and deny any more goals. However, the Bucknell offense was unable to score on their opportunities. Holy Cross ended the Bison season in a 1-0 loss.

Bucknell did earn five awards during the Patriot League Banquet on Friday night. Kristie Simon '04, Tara Uichel '03 and Savannah Kennealy '04 were among the top ten scorers in the league.

Simon also earned 2000 All-Patriot League First Team honors. She was a lethal offensive player who scored nine goals and dished out three assists this season.

Uichel was also honored as a member of the 2000 All-Patriot League First Team. She tallied five goals and seven assists for the Bison before falling to a knee injury.

Karla Killian '03 was selected to the All-Patriot League Second Team. Her defense was consistently strong all season, and she notched three assists.

"Killian was probably the most consistent player for us all season," Findlay said. "She provided non-stop composure in both her defending and attacking on the field."

The prestigious Patriot League

The Bison finished their season in fourth place in the Patriot League.

Coach of the Year award was given to Findlay. She led her squad to its first Patriot League Tournament since 1997 and guided them to an 8-9-1 season.

"Coach Findlay is the reason we had our success this year," tri-captain Kristen Erb '01 said.

Erb will be the only departure from the team, and things look bright for the women's soccer program.

"What is most important to me as a coach is for my team to have fun being a part of the program, while recognizing that we will always be capable of being at the top of the League," Findlay said. "As long as we train because we want to, not because we have to, we will have success."

Water polo looking towards Eastern Championships

By Brooke Rea

As most Bucknell sports teams wrap up their season this week and either move on to championship games or return in their uniforms until next season, the men's water polo team plugs away through two more weeks of practice.

Due to strong play this past weekend at the Southern Division Championships, the Bison men look ahead to the week-end of November 18-19, where they will culminate their season at the Eastern Championships.

Over the weekend, the men traveled to Annapolis, where Navy hosted the championship and became the overall victor. Bucknell defeated Grove City and Salem International before falling to Navy, taking third in the tournament and earning an Easterns bid despite the loss.

Saturday morning felt like a warm-up game for Bucknell, as they trounced Grove City in a 14-1 victory. Starting off tough with a press defense and quick counterattack, the Bison were able to get up early and replace the starters with eager-to-play subs. Nine players scored in the contest, with co-captain Kevin Permisin '01 and James Mante '01 leading the way.

Permisin had three goals, three steals and one assist, while Mante netted three goals and tallied four steals and an assist. Also active at both ends of the pool was freshman standout Jamie Sattelle with two goals, two assists, a steal, and one ejection drawn. Grove City's only goal came in the first quarter before the Bison shut them out for the rest of the game.

"This win was a good one for us in that we didn't play down to the level of the opponent," head coach John Zeigler said. "I was pleased with how aggressive we were at both the offensive and the defensive ends."

This aggression was maintained in the next game, a crucial contest against league foe Salem International. A victory against Salem would earn Bucknell a bid to Easterns, while a loss would most likely mean the end of their season. But the Bison had their sights set on Easterns, as they pulled out a clean 8-6 victory over the Tigers.

Bucknell owned the first half of the game, during which they outscored Salem 3-0 in the first quarter and 3-2 in the second. Junior Ryan McCarty led this attack, aided by Permisin and Mante in the first quarter and his brother, senior co-captain Justin McCarty, and sophomore Dan Lonnard in the second. The Bison led 6-2 at the half.

A rocky third quarter put three on the board for Salem while BU only netted one of their own. But the Bison squashed any hope of a Salem comeback with their dominating defense in the fourth. Once again, Ryan McCarty was all over the pool for the Bison, scoring one goal in both the third and the fourth quarters. These two points would keep the Bison ahead for the rest of the game and secure the 8-6 win.

Junior goalie Dave Kennedy also played well, contributing nine saves and two assists from the cage.

Salem's comeback effort was due primarily to standout Adriano Marsili, who scored five of the team's six goals.

"Although I felt we could have put Salem away early in the third quarter," Zeigler said, "I was happy with how we buckled down defensively in the fourth quarter, not allowing Salem's momentum from the third quarter to continue."

The final game of the weekend was a tough loss, in which Bucknell did not

Media circus strays from real issue

By Brian Watson

As sore-handed Florida election voters prepare to count absentee ballots, the American public remains glued to the media outlets with the hopes of learning every fast-breaking development in the marathon 2000 election.

The Florida recounts and legal confrontations have quickly and understandably become the biggest news story in years, even decades, leaving determined journalists fighting to break the latest revelations.

But the efforts to cover the developments since last Tuesday may be futile, as many believe that the recent developments lack the substance deserving of such extensive coverage.

Bush and Gore continue to battle for the state of Florida, the presidency, and the preservation of the Constitution.

Howard Kurtz, The Washington Post's media columnist, probably said it best: "There may be enough lawyers to staff an O.J. case, but there isn't enough hard news to fill 24 hours of talk television."

Still, journalists must be on alert—new developments, no matter how minuscule, are breaking every hour. But those events have led to about five minutes of commentary from TV pundits followed by endless dissections and extended commercial breaks. On the print side, newspapers and magazines across the country have devoted pages upon pages to columns, commentaries and series on the sometimes-bewildering election battle.

By calling states early on Election night, many times with only single-digit percentages reporting, the broadcast media learned a hard lesson—in the past week, TV pundits have shied away from making bold predictions.

Holocaust speaker reacts to hate crimes

By Heather Napolitano

The University remembered Kristallnacht last Thursday night on its 62-year anniversary, using the occasion to explore the nature of hate crimes in present day society. The program, entitled "Kristallnacht and Hate Crimes, Then and Now," featured guest speaker and local Holocaust survivor Fred Voss.

On Nov. 9, 1938, Nazi Germans began the persecution of the Jews on Kristallnacht, "the night of the broken glass," as they destroyed Jewish property including homes, synagogues and businesses. Voss, who had been visiting cousins in Germany, provided a first hand account of the evening:

"All of a sudden we heard a commotion," he said. "I walked out and saw flames... [a passer-by] said the Jewish synagogue was in flames. My worst fear had materialized."

S.A.F.E.R. to stop local tire incineration

Two years ago, Viking Energy of Northumberland, a subsidiary of Tractebel Energy, was denied a new building permit that would allow it to burn tire-derived fuel (TDF). Viking Energy, located in Point Township, has submitted an-

Unbeknownst to the family, the men had taken him to a concentration camp.

The following January, Voss' mother signed papers presented to her by the Germans that would al-go.

But the family was able to acquire false visas. Using those documents, they left the country on April 20, 1939 and traveled to Belgium, England and finally the United States.

"And so we escaped Germany," Voss said.

"But tonight I would rather talk about what is going on in the U.S. and the world," he said.

Voss sadly spoke of the Holocaust denial advertisement that appeared in the Nov. 2 issue of The Bucknellian. According to Voss, 12 million human beings died as a result, 67 of which were members of Voss and his wife's immediate family.

"I personally feel deeply hurt by this kind of advertisement," he said.

Voss also recounted an incident involving an acquaintance in Philadelphia, Pa. He described the man as a white male, professionally dressed, whom three young men harassed due to the fact that he had left a gay bar minutes earlier.

"That was a hate crime just like those against the Jews," Voss said. "Wherever hate crimes are tolerated we risk reliving the Nazi years."

Voss further emphasized the existence of hate crimes in today's society by citing such tragedy.

other plan for approval from the Pennsylvania Department of Environmental Protection (PADEP) to burn shredded tires, chipped railroad ties and paper/plastic pellets for fuel. The possible negative environmental effects from this incineration have concerned many residents of Point Township and sur-

Due to wind and water flow, these emissions could pose threats to individuals, especially within a 15-mile radius. Pollution from the Viking facility, adjacent to Fumman's Foods, would therefore affect citizens of the University and the rest of Lewisburg, as well as Selinsgrove and other surrounding communities.

If Viking is granted approval, it will burn approximately five tons of shredded tires per hour which will release heavy metals and other dangerous pollutants into the air.

"I am very afraid for the health of myself, my family, the community, and surrounding communities," said Zeigler Health Center Nurse and co-founder of S.A.F.E.R., Jane Haile. "Tires are known to contain at least 17 heavy metals. In addition to heavy metals such as arsenic and chromium, burning tires for fuel has been shown to release other dioxins and toxic substances, such as carbon monoxide. These chemicals are potent carcinogens and thyroid and immune system disrupters.

There are currently no plans for installing appropriate equipment for removal of these metals before emission into the atmosphere. In

Parking rules to be strictly enforced

By Jennifer Jenchura

The borough of Lewisburg has decided to initiate towing of illegally parked vehicles that are determined to be interfering with the removal of leaves.

The reason for the fervent and lengthy leaf removal process was instituted years ago as a benefit to area taxpayers. Instead of just a simple ticket, offenders now face heavier fines and the possibility of having their Street parking around Lewisburg will soon be more strictly enforced to allow quick and efficient leaf removal on the streets.

This practice will occur throughout the month of November and will resume again during the snow season.

Although students did not receive this notice until Nov. 14 from Public Safety email, the borough felt the need to warn residents about the new aggressive measures.

The Police Committee cited work safety as its reason for the notice.

"Nobody is born hating, instead people learn to hate and be prejudiced. That can be unlearned. To close the book on hate will not be easy, but it must be done before we have another Holocaust in this beautiful world of ours," Voss said.

The two-hour program also featured an introduction by Adam Feldman '01, a song by Voices of Praise and a candle lighting ceremony led by Risa Salsburg '02.

Individuals from Hillel, the Muslim Students Association, the NAACP, Kappa Alpha Psi and Voices of Praise took part in the ceremony.

"We light candles to remember the hate crimes the world has faced," Salsburg said.

Gore campaign disputes petition to halt recount

Florida Secretary of State Katherine Harris filed an emergency petition with the Florida Supreme Court today seeking to halt all manual vote recounts in the state. Gore campaign observer Warren Christopher said Harris' petition to stop the recounts would "only result in further delay." The pilot—27-year-old Captain Warren B. Sneed of Circleville, Ohio—had been missing since the accident early Monday and was presumed dead.

PIETERMARITZBURG, South Africa (AP)—A white farmer has been sentenced to 25 years in prison for killing a black farm worker by dragging him behind his pickup truck, police said Wednesday.

Campus Awareness Remembering the Holocaust

By Erin Leigh Rosenthal

"First they came for the socialists, and I did not speak out because I was not a socialist. Then they came for the trade unionists, and I did not speak out because I was not a trade unionist. Then they came for the Jews, and I did not speak out because I was not a Jew. Then they came for me and there was no one left to speak for me," Pastor Martin Niemöller said.

These words are inscribed on a wall in the National Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. During the Holocaust, nine million Jews were held captive and six million Jews were killed by the Nazi regime during World War II. Two out of every three Jews were killed in 21 countries by 1954 in Europe.

Although Nazi genocide was primarily directed towards Jews, hundreds of thousands of Gypsies and 250,000 disabled persons were also victims.

Nazis also murdered people because of their nationality and beliefs, such as homosexuals, communists, socialists, trade unionists and Jehovah's Witnesses, who were said to be anti-social.

In addition, there were three million Soviets held as prisoners, and millions of Poles and Slavs, who were used in slave labor.

In Jan. of 1933, Adolf Hitler was appointed chancellor to the most powerful position in the German government. He also led the National Socialist German Workers Party (or Nazi Party), the strongest right-wing party in Germany. Hitler began to do away with democracy by limiting individual freedoms.

He enforced this with the Special State Police (the Gestapo), the Storm Troopers (S.A.) and the Security Police (S.S.), arresting and murdering leaders of opposing political parties, beginning with the socialists, communists and liberals.

They prevented Jews from attending school, going to the movies, theaters, and walking in certain cities. In Nov. of 1938, the Nazis went on a riot, destroying German and Austrian Jewish synagogues, Jewish-owned stores and homes. This is now known as Kristallnacht ("The Night of Broken Glass").

During this time, Jews and other "undesirables" were arrested and imprisoned. The males were put into concentration camps while the females were sent to local jails.

These arrests went in waves, imprisoning thousands at a time. Many Jews tried to leave the country and some were successful, but many did not have the funds or were unable to obtain visas.

In Sept. of 1939, World War II began with the German invasion of Poland. The Poles were defeated within one month and were enslaved. Leaders in the Polish government and towns were killed.

Polish children were kidnapped and given to German families who wanted kids, while others were put into camps where they died of disease, starvation and lethal injection.

This same year Hitler ordered the killing of any people who were institutionalized, handicapped or had incurable diseases by starvation or lethal injection.

By 1940, Germany easily defeated Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, Luxembourg and France and were at war with the Soviet Union.

Axis Powers: Italy, Romania and Hungary. The Soviet Union was getting its help from the Allied Powers of the British Commonwealth, Free France, and the United States.

By this time the concentration camps were filling up, so ghettos, transit camps and forced labor camps were created to imprison Jews, Gypsies and other victims of the Nazis' ethnic hatred.

Many died from the over-crowding and poor conditions, such as starvation, disease and exposure to cold.

In the early 1940s the Nazis wanted to abolish the ghettos in other countries, so they created death camps near railway stations. The Nazis loaded people into the railway cars and took them to the camps. Inside the camps the prisoners were told that they were going to the showers.

Upon hearing that they were being investigated for an alleged hazing incident, the brothers promptly submitted a detailed proposal accepting fault for the event and subsequently presented a list of initiatives to serve as the vehicle to eliminate hazing on campus and reduce alcohol abuse.

"Rather than being suspended from the University, the chapter wanted to become advocates against hazing and was—and still is—willing to organize programs to change the culture of new member education programs in Greek organizations, athletic teams and other student organizations," Steinegger said.

"The University, however, sees this differently and we are extremely disappointed with their decision. It is clear that the sanctions handed to us merely serve to punish rather than educate our chapter, other Greek organizations, and the campus as a whole."

CJB rules allow SAE to appeal the decision. The appeals board is comprised of two students and one faculty member who have the power to change the sanctions or to uphold them.

Although the appeal process has not been started, Steinegger has indicated that it will be shortly.

"It is our intent to appeal the sanctions as we feel that we should be held accountable for our actions but not in the way that the University has decided," he said.

Ferraro has encouraged the brothers to appeal the decision: "The brothers of SAE are ... good people, and I was sorry to see them embroiled themselves in this awful situation due to a terrible lapse in judgment," he said.

"I have encouraged them to use all the resources that the University conduct system puts at their disposal."

Despite their dissatisfaction with the way the investigation turned out, the brothers of SAE do wish to convey their sincere apologies.

"Sigma Alpha Epsilon does not condone or support any types of hazing whatsoever and we are extremely sorry for what we have done," Steinegger said speaking on behalf of the chapter.

"We apologize to the University and its administration, the faculty and staff, the Greek community, the SAE Supreme Council and its chapter houses nationwide, the Bucknell student body and most importantly our new members and their families."

An appeal date has not been set.

Noted West Virginia Environmental Councilman Tom Degan has also spoken publicly about the dangers of dioxins.

"Dioxins are recognized by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) as the most potent man-made carcinogen. In its 1994 Reassessment on Dioxin, the EPA concluded there was no safe level of exposure to dioxins," Degan said.

"Exposure to dioxin at even extremely low levels can cause a wide range of serious health effects including reproductive impairment, developmental injuries, and increased risk of diabetes."

Haile said, "Part of the Mission Statement of the University Health Center is to 'live in harmony with the environment.' By not opposing Viking Energy, I am going against the mission of health services."

Viking Energy is a multinational corporation. Both PADEP and Viking are aware of the opposition from Point Township supervisors and citizens.

However, the decision as to whether or not to permit this tire incinerator ultimately lies with the PADEP. S.A.F.E.R. held its first public meeting on Nov. 14 and is in the process of obtaining written support from local politicians.

Students interested in getting involved should contact Jane Haile at haile@bucknell.edu.

tions and instead chose to focus their coverage on jumps from Florida reporters to Bush's Austin ranch and Gore's front lawn football exploits.

Meanwhile, several publications, including the Post and The Los Angeles Times, began to look at the flip side of the current confusion—the possibility that the loser will be back, and, by playing on the "martyr" status that may go along with finishing second in such a hotly-contested, seemingly endless fight for the presidency, may win the next election.

Both papers report that Democrats and Republicans alike are beginning to tire from the deliberations and recounts, and may even be hoping for their opposing party to come out the victor.

"This is going to be a very difficult four years for either Al Gore or George Bush to govern," Senator Robert G. Torricelli (D-N.J.) told the Post. "The economy likely will slow. Neither will have a sense of mission, and to cause problems for the incumbent party."

Republican strategist Scott Reed, Bob Dole's 1996 presidential campaign manager, said in Wednesday's Times that the loser could come out on top in 2004. "I'd watch for a rematch with these gentlemen-absolutely. If the loser goes in a dignified manner, he'll be a shoe-in for his party's nomination in four years."

Will Gore concede if the absentee ballots push his opponent over the top? Or will Bush contest a Gore victory with a flurry of legal action?

Either way, the next president will have to deal with probable political weakness. If Bush does win the electoral but not the popular vote, his credibility against a more evenly balanced Congress may be crushed. If Gore wins Florida and the election, some may claim it was the result of poor Republican strategy in not demanding recounts in other closely contested states.

Right now no one knows the answers, and much to voters' dismay, they may not be revealed for weeks. And when that happens, expect the media to go all out to

Penny project to exceed expectations

By Katie Marston

The University community is participating in the Million Penny Project for its second year, and so far has raised well over the $10,000 goal.

This Greek sponsored event gives every fraternity and sorority chapter on campus the responsibility to raise money for the Foundation for Student Giving, which provides opportunities for local high school students to participate in philanthropies in their area.

The project began in mid September and has included such events as Midnight Mania, Pancakes for Pennies and the state cross-country meet.

"Once again, the Greek community has answered the call for support and has put forth a great effort," Junior Eric Green, Inter-Fraternity Council philanthropy chair and co-project director, said of this year's Million Penny Project.

The pancake brunch two weeks-end encouraged Greek members to exchange their meal credit for a delicious meal of pancakes. This breakfast was also open to the rest of the campus and Lewisburg communities, and accepted alumni donations as well.

Green and Brandi Herman '02, Panhellenic philanthropy chair and co-project director, respectively, attribute a great deal of the Million Penny Project's success to last weekend's earnings.

In addition to the brunch, members of Greek organizations on campus worked the concession stand at the cross-country meet on the mod field, as chapter community service toward the project.

"The greatest part of the Penny Project is that everyone can help in small ways to make a big difference for the community," said Herman.

Throughout the time span of the Million Penny Project, each Greek chapter is responsible for setting up and regulating five can collection locations throughout the Lewisburg community.

Every week the sorority or fraternity counts their can donations and keeps track of their funds, ultimately hoping to raise $500 in their chapter's name.

On Nov. 18, the project will come to a finish with a presentation at the University's home football game against Colgate.

The project's great success has also been noted by Dean Baker: "I am so proud of all the chapters thus far, and I encourage the trend to continue until the end of our drive."

Not in Bucknell's backyard

The recent proposal by Viking Energy of Northumberland to burn shredded tires, chipped railroad ties and paper/plastic pellets for fuel present health hazards for both the humans and the surrounding environment. The planned location for the incinerator is in Point Township, across the river from the University, near Sunbury.

Tires contain heavy metals that do no burn away—emissions like chromium and arsenic can be extremely harmful. The proposed location, then, will have serious implications for surrounding areas—pollution can both affect the Susquehanna River as well as travel via wind in the direction of campus and the borough.

Nine concerned citizens have formed Susquehanna Area for Environmental Responsibility (S.A.F.E.R.) in order to combat the plan. While this approach is a step in the right direction, one wonders how successful their efforts can be against a multi-national corporation. One way to guarantee increased effectiveness is to inform and involve every individual on campus.

The student body can be a very powerful tool for change—our size and enthusiasm can add to the voice of opposition. In order for this to happen, however, all parties involved in this debate—Viking energy, the borough, and even administrators—should make sure to keep students abreast of the situation. Lines of communication should remain open since this has the possibility of affecting every party on campus.

While environmental hazards cannot be avoided at this point in time, there must be a safer area to put the incinerator. It is a clear case of the NIMBY complex—Not In My Backyard. When certain unfavorable industries plan to build or development a dangerous or undesirable establishment near residential sectors. Likely to cause residential outrage that try to fight the plan. Industries such as incinerators or power plants are used to facing similar opposition like S.A.F.E.R.

What S.A.F.E.R. can aim to do, then, is urge the company to look into alternative measures to produce fuel while avoiding pollution and contamination. Removal is simply a temporary solution to a permanent problem. To truly accomplish something for the environment would be to work with Viking energy to permanently change their tire-burning process to find a more environmentally friendly way to produce fuel.

S.A.F.E.R. may not be able to accomplish that goal alone, but with every student, faculty member and administrator that joins this worthy cause they become one step closer.

Letters to the Editors

To the Editors:

The Holocaust is real. There is no doubt in my mind. I have seen a concentration camp first hand (Dachau, Germany). I have seen the terrible tortures that many people experienced at such horrid places as these, and to be frank it sickens me. But this is not why I am writing.

I am writing in response to some letters to the editors that, greatly disturbed me. The letters were in response to the distasteful advertisement that was placed in The Bucknellian two weeks ago. The advertisement came as quite a shock to me. However, I do not think that one person's terrible mistake in editing should reflect upon the entire Bucknell community.

Several of the letters to the editor referred to the Bucknell community as heading towards neo-Nazism. As a student at Bucknell, I take offense. It was a terrible mistake that should have never happened, but I think that The Bucknellian recognizes this and is doing its best to make reconciliations. This mistake was awful, but it should by no means classify our entire community as anti-semitic.

Nicole LaMothe '01

To the Editors:

The History Department requests that The Bucknellian correct and reprint the letter that we sent to the editors last Wednesday, Nov. 8. An error appeared when someone at The Bucknellian changed the word "group" to "groups" in the sentence that originally read: "There is an abundance of evidence from Allies, Germans, and survivors alike documenting the facts that this group claims are merely the product of a Jewish conspiracy." The error that appeared in the letter printed by The Bucknellian suggests that the History Department believes the group that placed the advertisement (The Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust) is itself a "product of a Jewish conspiracy." Instead, we were refuting the claim, made by this "Committee," that the facts of the Holocaust have been fabricated because of some Jewish conspiracy.

Newspaper office conditions a concern

By Jim Leahy

The 21st century here in Lewisburg is full of promise, hope and excitement. The University is beginning a major expansion of its athletic center, academic facilities, residence halls and other physical plant assets. We have a spectacular new dormitory, a sparkling new music building and our more recent academic buildings are state of the art. But there are still some glaring problems on campus that deserve attention because of their inherent dangers and lack of continuity with the general appearance of the University.

In the basement of Roberts Hall, a group of about 30 students gather weekly to produce this very publication in what have to be the most deplorable conditions imaginable on campus. The Bucknellian offices expose student staff to conditions that are not only harmful but in some cases, potentially dangerous to our health. And the University has known about this for the entire semester and has taken very little action to resolve the situation.

Many of you are probably wondering what the problems are and how they could possibly be so bad. There are really three main concerns we have—the overwhelming light, electromagnetic fields and the possibility of exposed asbestos. Let me explain. Electromagnetic fields, or EMFs as medical literature calls them, are created when electricity flows through wires, computers and cell-phone antennae. Some studies have linked them, not always definitively, with certain cancers including brain tumors and Leukemia. The September/October 1994 issue of Natural Health suggests that humans are needlessly exposed to these hazards by seemingly harmless devices as simple as an electric can opener. So one must wonder what the entire electrical distribution for Roberts Hall can produce.

The electrical distribution panel is located behind one of the walls enclosing our office. Adjacent to that wall sit two powerful Macintosh G4 computers and 21-inch Studio Display monitors. In the last few weeks, one of those monitors has begun to act very strange. Sometimes the screen turns pink and other neon colors without any prior warning. All attempts to fix the problem are futile and ISR has told us that it must be from the interference coming through the wall.

Now I am no scientist, but allow me to apply some logic here. I am sitting all of two feet from a high powered computer monitor dangerous in its own right and that very monitor cannot handle the interference coming through the wall behind it. What exactly is happening to my body? Honestly, I do not want to know.

Problem two is a bit more basic. Within the last year, our office was given a new air conditioner to make our working conditions more comfortable. Thanks, but why is it still in the mid 80s in the office every night while the temperature outside is a balmy 30°? We were even thinking of opening a public sauna and charging admission to bump up our revenues. Plus, the thing has leaked in the past and nearly ruined my printer. Most of the time, I try to wear shorts and a t-shirt when I am in there because of the heat. Reminds me of Davis Gym on a game night.

But the most serious problem with the office is the most obvious to anyone who has done as much as opening the door. It all started as a simple leak in the ceiling above the door. That developed into two holes leaking water and a pipe showing itself through them. The pipe, we have been told, is wrapped in asbestos insulation. Comforting thought, huh? I know it has not been disturbed but when Coleman Hall and soon the Langone Center are renovated to rid them of the asbestos mistake, having a pipe in clear sight with asbestos all over it is a bit discomforting.

To make matters a little worse, on Wednesday, Nov. 8, right in the middle of our production schedule, workers were in the office knocking the plaster off the ceiling with masks on while we were working away on the computers. The dust from the demolition work was floating around the room and you could taste it.

Rebecca Rowland, who was also in the office at the time, and I left coughing. I felt sick for the rest of the day. I think that Physics Plant does a great job here on campus keeping the University in top shape but to do demolition work while we are trying to produce a paper seems a little silly. If we do not use the office at all on Mondays and Fridays, why not do the work then?

So what can be done? Well, at least fix the holes and think about taking some of the asbestos off that pipe. The heat situation is not helped by the fact that all the electrical equipment surrounding the room just makes this area that much worse. Or the University could let us leave the air conditioning set at a lower temperature.

All this could be done, if the University so desires, over the winter break. We will be completely out of the office for about a month. Plenty of time to finish a project like this.

Looking further down the road, the Carnegie Building, right across the RTK quad, will be empty in a few years once the Geology Department gets its new home. Why not make that building into a student organizations center where groups can have a home to call their own. That way, a historical building on campus does not have to be reduced to a faint memory.

The Bucknellian deserves a better place to do its work. The staff and students who volunteer to inform the campus and local community are working unnecessarily in a potentially harmful office. All we ask is for some consideration from the University.

States battle with flawed system

Election woes continue to plague annoyed voters nationwide, particularly in Florida

By Kristen Jancuk

I would like to use my editorial space this week to extend congratulations to the new President of the United States of America, George W. Bush. No, wait, I mean Al Gore—hmm, that's wrong too. Oh, now I remember. We don't actually have a president yet. Silly me.

I do not actually want either candidate elected to office. Neither does the rest of the country. If we achieved a voter turnout of 50 percent and neither candidate received half the popular vote, that means (and I'm not a math whiz, this could be a grave error on my part, though certainly not the first mathematical error of this election) that each candidate is supported by less than 1/4 of the population. Not exactly an overwhelming call to power.

And now it all comes down to Florida, a pretty sad fact in and of itself. Is anyone really concerned with New Mexico or Oregon? No. Their votes basically don't matter. The people here will probably never vote again. This election doesn't exactly scream "exercise your right to vote." It screams "stay in bed and leave it up to the Floridians. We'll let you know in a few months."

I have been reading up on this week's past events on the Internet (much better than having to listen to Gore and Bush ramble on and on about "fair elections" on TV) and I am becoming increasingly disheartened and losing my faith in human intellect. I think that perhaps monkeys could've run a smoother election.

We've all heard about those "confusing ballots," you know, the ones with arrows pointing directly toward the correct hole to punch. As sad as this is, what's worse is that Florida just decided to disregard the 19,000 ballots with more than one vote. Can anybody call this fair? These people made an honest, albeit foolish, mistake, so, yes, it makes perfect sense to deny them their right to vote completely. Nineteen thousand votes is going to have a big impact on the outcome of this election. These votes can't simply be ignored. Unless, of course, you're George W.

Some of the same ballots on the other hand, weren't double punched, but voters complained that they had accidentally voted for the wrong candidate. Strange? Yes. Dim-witted? Of course. But even Pat Buchanan agreed that all those votes could not possibly have been meant for him. This speaks volumes.

In Pinellas County a recount was called for when 400 uncounted votes had been discovered. The state of Florida is obviously in the habit of hiring extremely competent workers. This isn't the local PTA board election, it's the presidential election. If you are specifically hired to count ballots and do nothing but count ballots, how do you mess that up? It's not a difficult concept.

There is one question in the back of everyone's minds: if this many Florida votes were miscounted or uncounted, what about the rest of the country? While other states didn't have such close margins between candidates that doesn't mean there weren't mistakes. Big mistakes. Maybe Ralph Nader is really the president. Who knows?

But the mistakes have been made. They can't be undone, so what should be done about it? Of course, no one can agree because that would be too easy.

Let me offer some suggestions. Leave Clinton in office. He's (slightly) more intelligent than George Bush and he's way more exciting than Al Gore. Or, since 19,000 Florida residents have already been denied the right to vote, just disregard Florida completely. Sure, it's not fair, but what exactly has been fair about this election anyway?

Corporations must contribute to community

By Allyson Demerath

Community service continues to be a popular extracurricular activity for most high school and college students. Whether helping society through group efforts or independent endeavors, anyone who performs philanthropic services knows the multitude of benefits involved.

I would like to argue that this growing "trend" should become common practice in the business world. Corporations should organize philanthropic events for their employees. With their vast resource of able-bodied people, corporate assistance could make a tremendous effort toward bettering society.

Too often in today's fast-paced society, businessmen and businesswomen simply write out a check at their $5,000 plate charity dinners. They wear black ties and sequined gowns during their efforts to help the poor instead of throwing on some old blue jeans and donating a few hours to help build a home or mentor a child.

These corporations provide money because they like the public relations exposure associated with charities, not because they sincerely want to help those less fortunate. Worse yet, some corporations feel giving back to the community is not even their responsibility.

Often these same corporations do not have respect for the environment or their own employees.

with involvement in many areas.

Actively volunteering time, energy, and commitment can be a win-win situation for all of those involved. Those less fortunate who benefit from services gain much more than the tangible effects.

Whether it be receiving coats for the winter or a new house from Habitat for Humanity, they are likely to also gain back company. Often a "hand up" as opposed to a "hand out" can go a long way. Whatever the result of community service, it eliminates some of the constant worry and uncertainty in the hectic lives of those less fortunate who are living from day to day.

Additionally, this type of hands-on philanthropic work has endless benefits for the corporation. Working together in coordinating and actually building the house enhanced employees' teamwork skills. Employees who did not know each other previously have a chance to form friendships and relationships outside of the hectic work environment. Those who work on projects together share a common bond.

Through strategically planning on tackling the project, employees further develop communication skills. Instead of just performing volunteer work independently, they have to talk to one another and determine the most efficient method.

Bonding time spent together creates a sense of community within the company. Instead of forcing relationships in the office, the employees work together in a less stressful environment.

Through donating their time to a worthy cause, the employees display their concern for the good of society. This differentiates their company from many others and provides a company characteristic the employees take pride in. In addition to all of these benefits, the employees walk away from a project and truly feel good about it.

Unlike projects at work, which may not always have favorable results, community services always conclude with incredibly heartwarming outcomes.

Corporations should be giving back to the community. Without a healthy economy and market, these corporations would not survive. Businesses of any scale should donate time, energy, and finances to create a functional and prosperous society.

Today's society suffers from a lack of dedication and concern for the average citizen. When corporations make a point of giving back to the community, everyone benefits. Increasingly, corporations are involving themselves because society, specifically the poor, needs this attention.

Corporate cultures lend themselves to this environment because they have masses of able volunteers and finances to help achieve their goals quickly.

Florida recounts vital to outcome of presidential election

By Gretchen Schrock

As if the course of the current United States presidential election is not suspicious enough with accusations of confusing ballots in Palm Beach County, FL that led thousands of Jewish citizens to vote for the conservative Christian Pat Buchanan, another layer of mistrust has been added.

On Tuesday, a Florida State judge decided to let the deadline of 5 p.m. for all Florida counties to file recounts of the presidential election stand, raising the question if manual recounts in a few counties could be completed by the deadline.

However, Circuit Court Judge Terry P. Lewis of Leon County left the possibility for the secretary of state, Katherine Harris, to consider late totals, but the chances of that occurrence are extremely low.

Why would Harris not allow the inclusion of these late recounted ballots when overseas ballots are not even due until Friday? The answer is pure politics.

Harris is an elected Republican official and the co-chairperson of the George W. Bush campaign in Florida. Is it not ironic and is potentially questionable that the person ultimately deciding what ballots are counted in the state of Florida is at the head of the Republican presidential candidate's campaign in her state?

The judge ordered that Harris could reject the late ballot filings only after using "the proper exercise of discretion" and after considering "all appropriate facts and circumstances."

Claiming that the law fixes the deadline, Harris has remained extremely adamant about abiding by the 5 p.m. deadline.

Therefore, considering her firm decision, there will not be any consideration of future facts and circumstances regarding the late filing of ballots, unless, according to her office, there is some mechanical malfunction of the counting machines.

However, after the ruling was announced, Harris did not specify whether or not she would continue using that standard.

It can then be assumed that under no conditions will late arriving ballots be considered.

According to the New York Times, Warren Christopher, a former secretary of state who is overseeing the recount effort for the Gore campaign in Florida, said on Monday that Harris seems to be trying to "produce a particular result" in the election.

In addition, he said, "It also looks like a move in the direction of partisan politics and away from the nonpartisan administration of the election laws."

The possibility of partisan politics entering the determination of which Florida votes are counted could indefinitely suspend the presidential election outcomes.

The Gore campaign threatens to go back to court if Harris arbitrarily rejects manual recount totals without providing acceptable reasons. According to the Gore campaign and two Florida counties, the law is flexible enough to allow a delay until Friday, when all overseas ballots must arrive by mail.

Harris is undoubtedly playing partisan politics already if what the Democrats assert is true.

The country has been waiting for the presidential outcome for a week. At this point, is the addition of three more days to the waiting period extremely unbearable? If that addition is made to allow the correct tabulation of votes, the country will be more reassured that the right candidate was chosen to be our next president.

Otherwise, the question will remain in the minds of the majority of the country, who popularly voted for Al Gore by a margin of 214,097 votes, whether or not the extended deadline would have made a difference in the outcome.

George W. Bush is ahead in Florida by a total of only 338 votes.

The example of Broward County, FL provides very good reasons for allowing the extension of the ballot deadline.

A recount of sample precincts in that county found a gain of four votes for Gore, which led election officials to not proceed with a full recount because the gain was extremely small.

However, aides for the Gore campaign said that the sample count could translate into 400 additional Democratic votes in the whole county. The possibility is such a scenario makes an extended deadline even more essential to the accurate determination of where the 25 electoral votes for Florida should go.

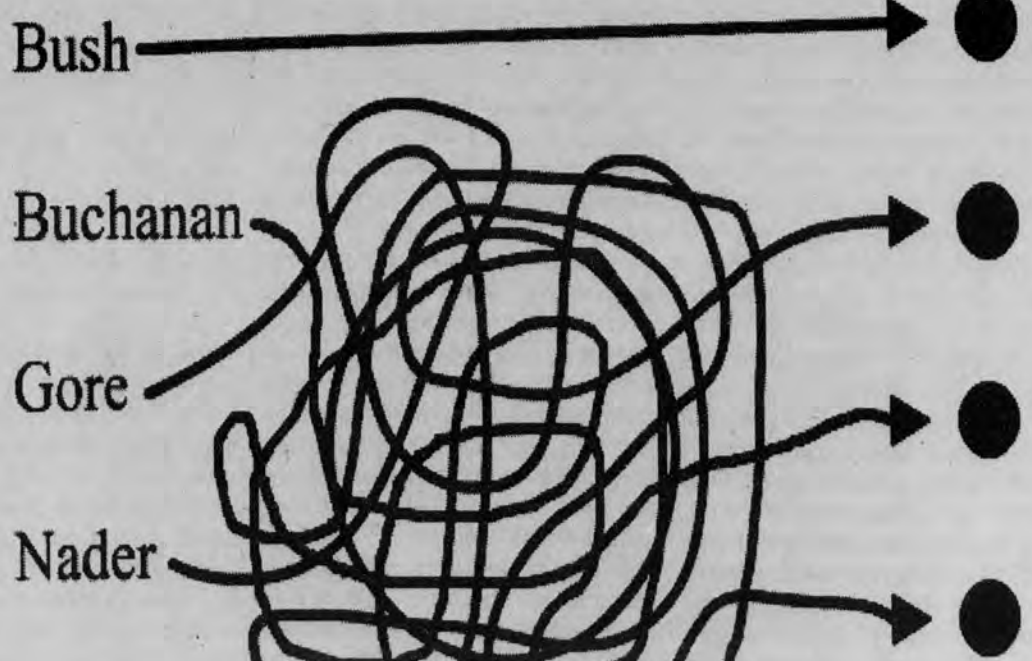

It is true that in any presidential election there will always be discrepancies and miscalculations in the tallying of votes, but in this current one, where the margins in the electoral vote and in the popular vote are extremely small, the amount of errors must be decreased.

The outcome is very significant because the country will be under that candidate's direction and influence for the four years of their presidential term.

In addition, that candidate will represent our nation and our democratic ideals to the world. It is not a question of who would be the best candidate for the position of President of the United States, but a question of which candidate the people actually voted for.

A local takeout survival guide Takeout pizza is a student's best friend

By Adam Turbett

In any college town there is usually an excess of pizza places. How can we be expected to know which place is best, taking into consideration delivery time, taste and price? There's only one way to find out: throw a pizza party and compare.

In order to serve you better, I called together a group of experienced pizza eaters and set Bella's against Vennari's.

Both establishments deliver and will come right to your door (even if you live in an on-campus building, as long as you order before the doors to your building are locked). I called Bella's and Vennari's simultaneously at 5:15 p.m. Less than a half-hour later, the two opposing pizza deliveries arrived at the same time and eyed one another suspiciously in the hall as we paid them.

While delivery time may be similar, taste and quality are quite different.

In fact, just by looking at the pizza, you can tell that you are about to embark upon two very different eating experiences.

At first glance, the crust of Bella's pizza looks much thinner than that of Vennari's. Bella's uses canned mushrooms, whereas Vennari's uses fresh ones.

As pizza connoisseurs know, whenever you compare food, taste, not appearance is everything. Of the seven other people who had the pizza, besides me, all of them liked Vennari's better.

"Why?" you ask. We found that Bella's put too much oregano into their sauce, thereby tainting the taste until you get near the crust, where the oregano seems to disappear. Some of our testers also remarked that there was not enough sauce in general on Bella's pizza.

For me, there just wasn't enough cheese on Bella's pizza. Around the crust was about a half inch of plain sauce. And the sauce lacked the rich flavor of Vennari's.

However, there were some complaints about Vennari's pizza. Some said that Vennari's pizza was greasier and floppier, which made it more difficult to eat.

Where Vennari's really shined though is in the crust. As Trisha Berner '04 said, "This is good crust." And Vennari's crust smells and tastes just like fresh bread.

Now, this is not to say that Bella's crust wasn't good; it just wasn't as good as Vennari's. Bella's crust did have a unique flavor to it. "This crust tastes like Chinese noodles," Berner said.

But even with its Chinese noodle crust, Bella's pizza fell far short of Vennari's. On a scale of five stars, five being best, we rated Vennari's 3 stars, and Bella's came in behind with only 1.5 stars.

Although each pizza parlor has its own unique taste, most college students want the best deal for their money. Both places had similar prices and delivery time, so these factors were not considered in the final decision. For this reason, taste is all-important. I highly recommend Vennari's Pizza Restaurant over Bella's.

Despite the fact that I constantly flirt with him he still hasn't asked me out yet, and I can't figure out why. I don't know if he just isn't picking up on my signals, or what his deal is, but it is getting to the point where he has to be mine. I swear if he doesn't call me in the next week I may just jump him one day in class and then at least he will know that I am interested. I guess that I should probably give him a call myself, but I am reasonably shy about making a move and don't think that I could go through with it. I am fine with giving him little signals, but not actually coming out and saying, "So, you wanna go out?" I just don't think that I could work up the nerve to do that.

So I ask you, how is this kid going to get a clue? Do you think that it will come to the point where I will have to resort to PDA before class, or is he actually going to ask me out? Basically, I just want my crush to give me a call.

Sincerely,
Lusting in Lab

Dear Lusting in Lab,
First off, let me tell you something about guys. They are not stupid, as you so mildly put it. Brushing your hair to the side, crossing your legs, and all of the other "tricks" that you women have simply don't work. In your female minds, you may be thinking, "I am really going to let him know this time; I think that I will play with my hair." However, the reality of the matter is they are thinking that you didn't wash your hair and are trying to rub out the dirt. It is not like we think, "damn she is playing with her hair she must want me bad so I better run to CVS and grab a pack of condoms because the Trojan man told me to." Your logic simply doesn't pan out.

The truth of the matter is that if you want to get our attention,

"Thick and juicy," one student said. "Short and stubby," another student said. This fry is best for potato lovers. It is the closest to regular restaurant fare. The only drawback would be that it really isn't what people go out to fast food places to find; it's just not McDonald's.

Finally, we have the Bison. All students agreed that the Bison fries were not quite up to par with "real" fast food fries, and yet most admitted that they were still enjoyable. First of all, students did not appreciate the $1.25 price tag considering the actual size of the fry containers. McDonald's and Burger King easily doubled the amount of fries, although they charged a bit higher.

The Bison fries received a 9 average for overall crispiness. That seemed to be the best reason for buying the fries. Students were disappointed with the meager amount of potato in the fries. They were very greasy too, students complained. Overall, the Bison fries are good if you like crispy, greasy fries. The main lament is the small number of fries, which leads to another problem. "They just don't fill you up enough," a frequent Bison eater said.

McDonald's is the standard fry. Going elsewhere depends entirely upon your individual tastes. People who want restaurant-like fries should go to Wendy's. Salt lovers should head for Burger King. The Bison fries present a nice alternative for people who either like crispy fries, or who can't stand a long walk.

Thanksgiving has always provided Americans with a reason to enjoy good food in the company of their family. Many University students travel home to eat a hearty meal and spend some time with the family they do not often get to see. But imagine a holiday without food on the table.

That very problem is what many local residents are faced with every year. Student-led Bucknell Harvest is on a mission to fight hunger and allow families to not only be happy at this time of year but year round.

In 1997, William Gruver, professor of management, saw much of Dining Services' already prepared food going to waste even though no one had touched it. Seeing not only a problem but also an opportunity, he moved to found Bucknell Harvest.

The premise of the organization is simple: take untouched and unserved food from the Cafeteria (the food they did not offer to the students but was sitting in the kitchen ready to be served) and donate it to a local charity where it would be put to good use.

Haven Ministries in Sunbury is the recipient of Bucknell Harvest's food. Presently, a designated Greek chapter on campus is responsible for the deliveries. On Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays, collected food is brought down to Sunbury. A member of the United Way of Central Susquehanna Valley, the shelter provides emergency and transitional shelter, food and life skills education to homeless and near homeless families and individuals.

The spring will bring a new opportunity to Bucknell Harvest. They include the immediate local community by helping the Lewisburg Food Bank. To do this, Weiss has agreed to increase the amount of food they donate and add another pick-up date for canned goods and non-perishables.

Housed in the First Baptist Church on the corner of South Third and Saint Louis Streets in Lewisburg, the Food Bank aims to help citizens in the eastern portions of Union County whose income levels place them below the federal poverty line. The food bank is also affiliated with the Union County United Way. The move to support a Lewisburg organization was only logical for Giacomelli. Many of the Greeks felt that more people would support Bucknell Harvest if they could keep some of their donations in the immediate area.

Bucknell Harvest is a member of Foodchain International and its group, America's Second Harvest. Located in Kansas City, MO, Foodchain seeks to not let any food go to waste when people are hungry. It is a network of over 200 centers that rescue food that would otherwise be headed for the landfill. In 1998, they rescued over 200 million pounds of food and were able to provide over 135 million meals.

So when you are sitting down to a delicious meal that will leave you stuffed, think of the members of Bucknell Harvest. They are trying to give local residents without the means to provide such a meal for themselves a chance to be thankful at this time of year.

Every year, the University's Admissions Office seeks students who they feel will make a positive contribution to their campus through their talents, interests and self-motivation.

They found one in Megan Rancier. Rancier, a senior music theory major, has added enthusiasm, energy and a love for learning to the student body since her freshman year. During her freshman year, she lived in the Humanities Residential College and joined the Symphony Orchestra's violin section, (recently, she performed as a soloist). Rancier later worked as a Junior Fellow with the Residential Colleges and as a Residence Assistant for a Humanities College hall.

Her involvement also reaches into SIRENS,

Elizabeth and I then went out to meet the rest of our group at an Irish pub in the center of Seville right next to the cathedral.

Luckily, one of the girls on the program, who was there for the year, showed us the way—otherwise we would have never made it in the dark! The next morning, I was up bright and early to take the bus to our orientation classrooms, about a half-hour outside of Seville in a small language institute. It would be here that, for the next two weeks, most friendships would form. This was the time we had to get to know each other before my adoptive city and the rest of Spain. Located in the southernmost autonomous community of Andalusia, Seville is an amazing city that spreads both sides of the Guadalquivir River. Palm and orange trees line many of the streets and fountains dot almost every spot in the city. The old Jewish quarter, Santa Cruz, is filled with

Nervion and Porvenir. What I miss most about Seville is the food. My friends and I quickly discovered the tradition of tapas; they were said to have originated in Madrid when waiters used to cover drinks with a small plate so that nothing got into them. As waiters began to put pieces of food on top of the plates, the

were not traveling. I miss the smell of orange blossoms in the spring. The Spanish cafes that line the streets, and the ceramic tiles used to decorate street signs and fountains. Though my feet are thankful, I also miss being able to walk everywhere, the best means of exploring the city.

takes hours and is in adoration of the Virgin Mary. People fill the streets at all hours to see the procession and it is a great family honor to have a member of the family be one of the people carrying the float. The neighborhood I lived in, Porvenir (which means "the future") was

An ordinary day for me would be to wake up in the morning and take the 20-minute walk to the University of Seville. Every morning I walked outside of the park and past the Plaza de España, a government building made up of two grand towers and adorned with ceramic tiles depicting each of the provinces in Spain. Foreign tour buses and sightseers always surrounded the Plaza.

I only had classes Monday through Wednesday, with a long break in between for la comida, traditionally eaten around 3 p.m. every day. Having classes only three days a week spoiled me, but also gave me a chance to travel around Spain. Between orientation and the start of classes, my friends and I traveled to three cities outside of Madrid—Segovia, Avila and Toledo.

I actually made it to Madrid five times, both to visit and to connect travels to various other places such as Salamanca, Valladolid and places in the Basque Country. At the beginning of the semester, my friends on the program and I found some cheap flights within Spain, so we joined the mass crowds of students outside the student travel agency and managed to get cheap tickets to Barcelona and the Mediterranean island of Mallorca. Of the 17 autonomous communities that I had made it my goal to visit, I saw eight. I also spent a weekend in the south of Portugal as the semester came to a close.

Of all my travels, Seville remained my favorite city in Spain and two of its world famous extravagant events in April made my love for the city grow even more. In the week before Easter, this highly Roman Catholic country celebrates Semana Santa (Holy Week) and Seville is the place to be if you want to see a good show. It is a week of religious floats and celebration. Every day statues leave their home churches to process through the streets to the cathedral, only to again return to their neighborhood after a brief stop inside the cathedral. The process

During both day and night there is eating, drinking, dancing and rides; all the while, the makeshift streets (which have special names for Feria and are all lined with casetas) are crowded with people and horse-drawn carriages. Luckily, one of my friends met a Spaniard who invited us to his caseta, so we were able to really be a part of Feria.

Looking back on all the times that I traveled on weekends, it was then that I realized that Seville had become my home. After a weekend of travel, my friends and I could not wait to go "home." I couldn't wait to get back to see "my" family and sleep in "my" bed. My Spanish family members, especially the middle daughter and my señora, became some of my closest friends and confidantes and we still keep in touch. One day I will get back to Seville and I am sure it will feel like I never left. I cannot wait for that day!

When asked what memories of the University she will keep with her after graduating, Rancier said, "My first all-nighter during finals, sledding at the golf course, hanging out at the radio station and cafe, the walk-out that a bunch of us from SEAC organized after we went to the anti-IMF/World Bank protest in Washington, D.C. Last spring, the 'Stop the Hate' marches, meeting violinist Joshua Bell at a concert my freshman year and the hours that I spent practicing my violin."

After I leave, I know that I will also think of certain professors, such as my advisor, Annie Randall, and all of the awesome people I've been privileged to meet over the years.

After recalling all that she has gleaned from her years here, Rancier continues to give back through her devotion to her work and the awareness that she struggles to bring to the campus. "When I came to Bucknell, I was in a position in which I thought I could contribute something; four years here taught me that I could make a difference if I really tried."

Wink Thinks

Dear Wink,

Have you ever heard that guys are stupid? I don't mean dumb as in school smarts, but just in common sense and picking up on other people's signals. You see there is this guy that is in one of my classes that I have been somewhat interested in for a while now. Every day in class I try to start a conversation with him. I guess you could say that I come off as a pretty friendly person, and I don't think that it is my looks that are scaring him away.

Despite the fact that I constantly flirt with him he still hasn't asked me out yet, and I can't figure out why. I don't know if he just isn't picking up on my signals, or what his deal is, but it is getting to the point where he has to be mine. Luckily, one of the girls on the program, who was there for the year, showed us the way—otherwise we would have never made it in the dark! The next morning, I was up bright and early to take the bus to our orientation classrooms, about a half-hour outside of Seville in a small language institute. It would be here that, for the next two weeks, most friendships would form. This was the time we had to get to know each other before my adoptive city and the rest of Spain. Located in the southernmost autonomous community of Andalusia, Seville is an amazing city that spreads both sides of the Guadalquivir River. Palm and orange trees line many of the streets and fountains dot almost every spot in the city. The old Jewish quarter, Santa Cruz, is filled with

Nervion and Porvenir. What I miss most about Seville is the food. My friends and I quickly discovered the tradition of tapas; they were said to have originated in Madrid when waiters used to cover drinks with a small plate so that nothing got into them. As waiters began to put pieces of food on top of the plates, the

were not traveling. I miss the smell of orange blossoms in the spring. The Spanish cafes that line the streets, and the ceramic tiles used to decorate street signs and fountains. Though my feet are thankful, I also miss being able to walk everywhere, the best means of exploring the city.

takes hours and is in adoration of the Virgin Mary. People fill the streets at all hours to see the procession and it is a great family honor to have a member of the family be one of the people carrying the float. The neighborhood I lived in, Porvenir (which means "the future") was

An ordinary day for me would be to wake up in the morning and take the 20-minute walk to the University of Seville. Every morning I walked outside of the park and past the Plaza de España, a government building made up of two grand towers and adorned with ceramic tiles depicting each of the provinces in Spain. Foreign tour buses and sightseers always surrounded the Plaza.

I only had classes Monday through Wednesday, with a long break in between for la comida, traditionally eaten around 3 p.m. every day. Having classes only three days a week spoiled me, but also gave me a chance to travel around Spain. Between orientation and the start of classes, my friends and I traveled to three cities outside of Madrid—Segovia, Avila and Toledo.

I actually made it to Madrid five times, both to visit and to connect travels to various other places such as Salamanca, Valladolid and places in the Basque Country. At the beginning of the semester, my friends on the program and I found some cheap flights within Spain, so we joined the mass crowds of students outside the student travel agency and managed to get cheap tickets to Barcelona and the Mediterranean island of Mallorca. Of the 17 autonomous communities that I had made it my goal to visit, I saw eight. I also spent a weekend in the south of Portugal as the semester came to a close.

Of all my travels, Seville remained my favorite city in Spain and two of its world famous extravagant events in April made my love for the city grow even more. In the week before Easter, this highly Roman Catholic country celebrates Semana Santa (Holy Week) and Seville is the place to be if you want to see a good show. It is a week of religious floats and celebration. Every day statues leave their home churches to process through the streets to the cathedral, only to again return to their neighborhood after a brief stop inside the cathedral. The process

During both day and night there is eating, drinking, dancing and rides; all the while, the makeshift streets (which have special names for Feria and are all lined with casetas) are crowded with people and horse-drawn carriages. Luckily, one of my friends met a Spaniard who invited us to his caseta, so we were able to really be a part of Feria.

Looking back on all the times that I traveled on weekends, it was then that I realized that Seville had become my home. After a weekend of travel, my friends and I could not wait to go "home." I couldn't wait to get back to see "my" family and sleep in "my" bed. My Spanish family members, especially the middle daughter and my señora, became some of my closest friends and confidantes and we still keep in touch. One day I will get back to Seville and I am sure it will feel like I never left. I cannot wait for that day!

When asked what memories of the University she will keep with her after graduating, Rancier said, "My first all-nighter during finals, sledding at the golf course, hanging out at the radio station and cafe, the walk-out that a bunch of us from SEAC organized after we went to the anti-IMF/World Bank protest in Washington, D.C. Last spring, the 'Stop the Hate' marches, meeting violinist Joshua Bell at a concert my freshman year and the hours that I spent practicing my violin."

After I leave, I know that I will also think of certain professors, such as my advisor, Annie Randall, and all of the awesome people I've been privileged to meet over the years.

After recalling all that she has gleaned from her years here, Rancier continues to give back through her devotion to her work and the awareness that she struggles to bring to the campus. An abroad perspective: Semester in Seville, Spain

By Daniela Vella-Camilleri

There are days when I sit back and am amazed that I actually spent the spring semester in Seville, Spain. It is hard to believe how drastically my life changed in the transition from being an American resident to living under the same roof with an authentic Spanish family, and then again how different life for me was once I returned to the United States and to the University.

My adventure began on Jan. 11, 2000, as the Iberia plane packed with American students took off from Kennedy Airport. My program, run by Sweet Briar College, consisted of only 50 people representing such universities as Brown, Harvard, Tufts, Yale and Columbia, to name a few. Bucknell students, nine in total, comprised the largest group of students from a single school, making it more comforting for me to be in a foreign country amidst new faces.

Due to some ticket problems, I was forced to fly alone on the earliest flight to Seville once we had reached Madrid's Barajas Airport. Luckily, I had met two girls from the University of Wisconsin who were also studying in Seville, so I had people to tag along with as we ran around switching terminals and using our Spanish for the first time in Spain.

I waited for hours in the Seville Airport for the rest of the students on my program until the director of Sweet Briar students, Blanca, showed up. From there, the women representing the families (called señoras) with whom students would be staying started to arrive and finally, the plane carrying the rest of the group landed. My señora, Conchi, came to meet me as we waited for my roommate to go through customs. Once my roommate, Elizabeth, came out of customs we took a taxi to the apartment where we would spend the next five months. After a good meal and a nap, I met Conchi's three children: Maria, Irene and Benito (ages 17, 14 and 5).

Over time, my homesickness wore away as I began to explore classes at the University started, where Sweet Briar students would begin to mix with other Americans studying in Seville and with the Spaniards, into whose University we were assimilating.

I will not deny that I was overcome with homesickness during the first few days that I spent in Seville. But my roommate was also missing family and friends so we found it easy to sympathize with one another. It was especially hard for me because I was afraid that people would forget me.

Over time, my homesickness wore away as I began to explore narrow and winding roads leading to hide-away spots such as La Carboneria, an old hideout for intellectuals during the Franco regime transformed now into a flamenco bar with amazing sangria (a fruity wine drink).

To get lost in Santa Cruz is to merely be exploring. Impressive buildings, such as the Gothic-style cathedral, the largest in the world, and the more famous landmark, the Giralda, are found in the heart of Seville. From the top of the Giralda, one can see five of Seville's most populated neighborhoods: Santa Cruz, La Macarena, Triana, concept of tapas was born (tapas comes from the word tapa which means to cover).

Another favorite, especially when traveling with the program to such other sites as Córdoba, Granada and Jerez was churros y chocolate. These breakfast fritters dipped into chocolate are sold everywhere and really fill you up in the morning! I miss being able to go for a run in the María Luisa Park, located only five minutes from the apartment in which I lived.

It was also a favorite spot to walk, relax and picnic with friends, as we did a few weekends when we

"I love the way that we can use music to express just about anything," Rancier said.

Recently, Rancier has focused her efforts upon her senior thesis, which will deal with music and its use in political protest.

Rancier will use Chile, the Soviet Union and South Africa as the foundations for her thesis, discussing examples of the music that has been used for political resistance in these areas. She admits that the project can seem like a daunting task.

"Writing a thesis is unlike anything else you do up to that point in college. It's a rediscovery of your own writing and thinking process," she said.

In a few years, Megan believes she will look into graduate school, most likely exploring ethnomusicology—the study of music within different cultures.

"I think music can sometimes feel like an elitist study, kind of pulling itself out of society, and I wanted to find a different way to use it," she said. Judging by her initiative in college, Rancier will most likely find that "different way" that she seeks.

When asked what memories of the University she will keep with her after graduating, Rancier said, "My first all-nighter during finals, sledding at the golf course, hanging out at the radio station and cafe, the walk-out that a bunch of us from SEAC organized after we went to the anti-IMF/World Bank protest in Washington, D.C. Foo Fighters fire up audience

By Trevor Rutledge-Leverenz

Last Saturday night, at around 10:15 p.m., the lights went out in the Fieldhouse, and over 1,000 eager fans started screaming. The concert that many had been anxiously anticipating had finally begun.

But when the lights went up, we did not see Dave Grohl the lead singer, guitarist and song-writer for the Foo Fighters, we saw Dave Grohl the drummer from Nirvana.

It was a beautiful sight to behold: Grohl and regular Foo drummer Taylor Hawkins going at it in a drum-off, hitting off the concert with "Break-Out," from their third and latest CD, There is Nothing Left to Lose. The concert went on for one and a half amazing hours with the band playing hit songs such as "Monkey Wrench," "Learning to Fly," "My Hero," "Everlong," "Next Year" and others.

The Foo Fighters take their name from a strange aerial phenomena seen during World War II. These objects came to be referred to as "Foo Fighters," "Foo" being slang for the French word for fire, feu. The Foo Fighters we know and love were formed in the wake of Nirvana's Kurt Cobain's death. As ex-Nirvana drummer, Grohl found himself in a bit of a quandary, because, he said, "as much as I missed Kurt, and as much as I felt so lost, I knew that there was only one thing that I was truly cut out to do and that was music."

He connected with drummer William Goldsmith and Nate Mendel from the band Sunny Day Real Estate, and Nirvana touring-guitarist Pat Smear. Grohl had already written most of the songs for what was to be their first CD, Blah, while with Nirvana. All that remained was record production. After many band member changes, Grohl remains constant and faithful to the group.

Grohl was obviously having fun with the crowd, pointing out that while he didn't finish high school, he was still richer than many of us ever will be. He then quickly reminded us to stay in school and don't do drugs. During the song "Monkey Wrench," he and Hawkins had another drum-off, with Hawkins winning handily.

All in all, the Foo Fighters gave an amazing concert, and props must go out to the Bucknell Concert Committee, who were able to obtain one of the greatest bands out there now.

Final Poetry Reading

By Richard Buckley

The final poetry reading of the year featured two contrasting poets: Ron Mohring and Rachel Blau DuPlessis.

Mohring, the new Philip Roth Resident Writer, participated in the 1994 Bucknell Seminar for Young Poets. Mohring read an array of finely crafted poems that proved him a welcome addition to the University. In "Pouring Tea," he elegantly described the hot liquid's reluctant descent from kettle to cup. In "Apparition," he announced the discovery of his muse in the cafeteria, a cafeteria that closely resembles Bostwick with its Coco-puff bins and salad bar.

Rachel Blau DuPlessis, a feminist critic who teaches at Temple University, followed Mohring. DuPlessis has authored books of poetry (Benga and The Fold) and has also performed important stories on the female modernist poet H.D. and on several other writers. As a guest in the Stadler Center Series in Innovative Poetics, DuPlessis read two rather impenetrable poems.

In introducing a section of one poem, she said "the poem" doesn't have full words often." She introduced another poem with the confession, "I don't know much Italian and what I do it is bad, so I kind of play with my madness."

Overall, the night, filled with the poetic talents of Mohring and DuPlessis, proved itself quite a success.

Senior Recital: Sikora

By Jenny Johnson

Senior Music Education Major Jennifer Sikora performed her senior recital last Sunday.

"I think my recital went very well. It was a lot of fun and so great to see so many of my friends in Bucknell Hall for my performance," Sikora said.

The recital opened with "Parto, Parto" from "La Clemenza di Tito" by Mozart with Sikora on her clarinet and singer Mollie Martin, a Junior music vocal performance major.

"The Mozart piece that I sang was by far the hardest piece I have ever done. I was happy for the experience of doing, in essence, a 'duet' with an instrument rather than another voice," Martin said.

"Mollie Martin has such a powerful, strong voice. It really was a pleasure playing with her," Sikora said.

The second piece on the program was Brahms' "Sonata No. 2 in E-flat Major." Sikora says, "The Brahms was definitely my favorite piece. For many years, I have wanted to perform the sonata and I'm glad that I decided to include it on this program. I was fortunate that David Cover agreed to play the accompaniment, as the piano part is very challenging and requires a large time commitment," Sikora said.

After completing the four extensive movements of the piece, Sikora let out an audible sigh of relief. The audience commended her for her hard work and perseverance with much applause.

Following the intermission, Sikora performed a 20th century piece entitled "A Joyous Lament for a Gilly Flower." Fellow Senior Music Education Major Renee Brody commented on the ironic nature of the title and how well Sikora portrayed the two qualities of melancholy and happiness.

The finale included a Beethoven piece for clarinet, piano and cello entitled "Trio in B-flat major." The cello was played by Zoya Jenks.

The audience and performers agreed that the recital was quite a success. Martin said, "The recital itself, I thought, went very well. All in all it was a good time!"

Christgau's Consumer Guide: Albums of the '90s

Alex Costos

Your key to the past

Are you one of those die-hard music fans? Do you have hundreds of empty CD cases floating around the floor of your car? Or do you have so many songs on your computer that you barely have any room for other programs? Renowned rock critic Robert Christgau's Christgau's Consumer Guide: Albums of the '90s is the perfect solution!

The guide contains over 3,800 different reviews of many groups and bands. Christgau reviews rap, country, alternative, salsa, classical, Latin, metal, religious and dance in this '90s music guide. Bands mentioned range from complete extremes: from The Dixie Chicks to DMX, Aerosmith to Christina Aguilera, B.B. King to Skid Row. Any album released in the '90s is practically guaranteed to be in Christgau's Consumer Guide.

Christgau began criticizing and reviewing many different types of music more than 30 years ago. He currently writes for famous magazines such as Playboy, Rolling Stone, Spin and several others. Christgau's Consumer Guide: Albums of the '90s is Christgau's third album guide.

Christgau ranks the albums on a letter scale from "A+" to "E." He also has seven other symbols that recognize the album as weak or poor or "not even worth your time." The review guide presents 396 pages of musical information, with an introduction by the author. Nearly every graded album includes a summarizing paragraph giving a reason for the grade. The higher-ranking albums have in-depth reviews where the lower ranked albums barely have a sentence because of the obvious fact that those albums are "not worth our time."

Christgau's works include Any Old Way You Choose It: Rock and Other Pop Music, 1967-1973 and Grown Up All Wrong: 75 Great Rock and Pop Artists from Vaudeville to Techno, along with two other consumer guides.

"Now more than ever, we need the ever-open-earred, mercilessly rigorous Robert Christgau. Again and again in these pages, he compresses an entire essay into a lucid, revelatory, witty paragraph... Christgau is the essential rock critic of the new century," Entertainment Weekly said and Request simply describes the book as "the best record guide money can buy."

Need they say more? If you're a music fan or even just interested in the music of the '90s, then Christgau's guide is the way to go!

Expansive and expensive: Bucknell Art Gallery

Located on the third floor of the Langone Center, the Art Gallery houses rare and original collections from around the world.

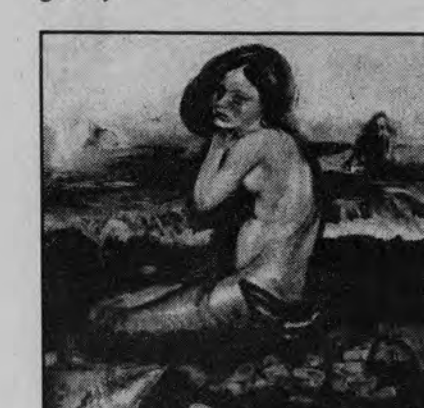

By Meghan Magee

"Off the Record: Music in Art" and "Recent Paintings" provide two reasons to visit the Bucknell Art Gallery. The Kress Gallery and hallway and lobby exhibits present more incentives to visit the gallery, with fascinating art ranging from the earliest known painting by Pontormo, "Cupid and Child," to 19th century Japanese art, including high quality inro boxes.

The Bucknell Art Gallery currently houses three formal exhibits, "Off the Record: Music in Art," "Recent Paintings" and the permanent Kress Gallery exhibit. The gallery also displays Rosalyn Richard's printmaking in a gallery corridor and several pieces of Japanese art in the entrance hallway.

Gallery curator, Stuart Horodner, chooses the shows that will be able to speak best to different disciplines and considers ways to enhance audience participation. He recognizes that the gallery functions with other venues for culture, and he witnesses this through the courses that use the gallery in their curricula. The Art History and Studio courses often use the gallery to support class work, and classes from the Music Department and even non-art oriented disciplines also attend the gallery exhibits to support class work.

Horodner kept in mind the varying disciplines when he took in the current exhibit, "Off the Record: Music in Art," which incorporates Jazz, Rock and Roll, Country Western, Disco and Reggae music as visual representations of music in art. Horodner found this exhibit appropriate because of the history of work between the Department of Music and the gallery.

Catherine Howe's painting See View is on display until December 10, along with several other pieces from her recent collection.

"I noticed a lot of different work being done by artists which engage ideas as music," Horodner said. As the gallery curator, he is responsible for examining the trends occurring in the world of art.

"Off the Record," consists of pieces by George Condo, Larry Kone, Jim Lambie, Christian Marclay and Jack Whitten. The group show includes paintings, sculpture and a sort of collage-assembly that display different attitudes and ways of working. Some of the musicians represented are the Dizzy Gillespie Band, Brooks & Dunn, Alan Jackson and Thelma Houston.

Just around the corner from the

"Off the Record" exhibit, the project room displays some works of Catherine Howe's "Recent Paintings."

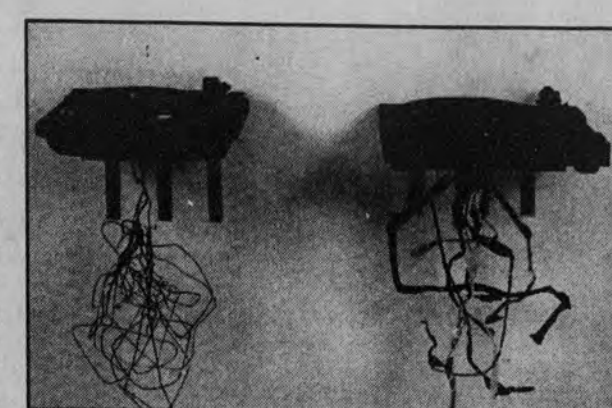

Both "Off the Record: Music in Art" and "Recent Paintings" opened on Oct. 13, 2000 and close on Dec. 10, 2000.

In addition to these two temporary exhibits, the gallery holds quite an impressive permanent display in the Kress Gallery. Twenty-four items occupy the Kress Gallery and were donated to the school by the Samuel H. Kress Foundation. This collection consists of such extraordinary pieces as "Cupid and Apollo," the oldest documented painting by Pontormo, "Madonna and Child," a very early Rosso Fiorentino, and other works by Tintoretto, Veronese, Francesco Cossa, Agostino Tassi and Andrea Sansovino.

The Kress collection will stay put, but be sure to catch "Off the Record" and Howe's "Recent Paintings" before the exhibit ends. The gallery will replace the temporary exhibits with "Dear Mr. Ripley: A Compendium of Curiosities from the Believe It or Not! Archives" in the Main Gallery and Robert Watts' medical collages, entitled "Dr. Bob," in the Project Room beginning on Jan. 15, 2001.

"Dear Mr. Ripley" promises to be a fascinating exhibit that documents many of the famous Mr. Ripley's human exploits, including a man who carried his sister and 12 cups of coffee while wearing ice skates, and Watts' medical collages include a photograph entitled Dislocationist, which shows a man who appears to have severely dislocated a leg.

If you don't feel like climbing the stairs to the Bucknell Art Gallery on the third floor, then take the elevator for an easy escape to artistic culture; it is well worth it!

Jim Lambie's Garage and Mobile Disco, made of a record deck, glitter and coathangers, is on display until December 10 as part of the "Off the Record: Music in Art" display in the Art Gallery.

The University's treasure chest

By Meghan Magee

The Bucknell Art Gallery, a hidden treasure on campus, resides on the third floor of the Langone Center. For those of you who have never made the hike up there, the gallery houses several exhibits, allowing students, faculty and visitors to take in a bit of culture on their lunch break, between classes, or even during mail checks.

With over 8,000 objects in its collection, the Bucknell Art Gallery consistently presents exhibits with works from artists around the world, pieces from the permanent collection, and loan exhibitions.

The gallery takes on the responsibility of contributing to the education of Bucknell community, which includes students, faculty and staff of the university as well as the region of central Pennsylvania.

Director Stuart Horodner and Operations Manager Cynthia Pelier strive to bring artwork to the gallery that is both educational and aesthetic, and succeed in doing so. Because of the varying needs and interests of the gallery's audience, Horodner and Pelier present diverse exhibits and events with the academic support of scholarly brochures and lectures.

The Bucknell Art Gallery, which originally opened in 1983 as the Bucknell Center Gallery and officially changed its name in 1998, offers artistic culture to its visitors Monday through Friday 11-5 and from 1-4 on Saturday.

Weis Series brings pianist Kevin Sharpe

Sharpe, an associate professor in the school of music at the University of Florida, will play pieces by George Walker, Chick Corea and "Fats" Waller. His sharp piano talents have earned him awards including the Oberlin Conservatory Rudolph Serkin Prize, the 1991 Johann Sebastian Bach International Piano Competition, and he received rave reviews after his New York debut in Weill Hall at Carnegie Hall. Sharpe also won impressive awards for concert performances at the Oberlin Conservatory and the Indiana University School of Music.

During the "Weis Center Series 4: Preludes!" series Sharpe will discuss the works of these in a lecture-demonstration.

During Sharpe's three-day residency he will present programs for children in local schools which culminate in his Weis Center concert.

Ben Stiller Meets the Parents

By Meghan Magee

Meet the Parents, a comedy about a male nurse named Greg Focker (Ben Stiller) who is head over heels in love with and ready to propose to his girlfriend Pam (Teri Polo), may not be the comedy of the year as predicted, but this amusing film leads the audience to sympathize with Focker's catastrophic weekend at his girlfriend's parents' house.

Greg plans to pop the big question at Pam's parents' house, where they go for Pam's sister's wedding, but faces many obstacles, namely her father Jack Byrnes (Robert De-Niro). The Byrnes family appears to be Cleaver-esque, with a picturesque house, a happily married couple, two successful and attractive daughters and the infamous family cat, Jinx, a foe to Focker.

Focker goes to extreme measures to thiness to date his daughter, and the not so mild-mannered father intimidates Focker. In one scene Byrnes approaches Focker and says, "I'm a patient man. That's what 19 months in a POW camp will do to you. If you think you're trying to corrupt my first-born child in any way, I will bring you down, baby! I will bring you down to China-town!"

Engineering a good program

Engineering department impresses students and nation
By Matt Albert and Monica Montgomery

University staff can set the Bertrand Library clock by watching the flow of engineering students coming in and out of Dana Engineering each hour, exactly on the hour.

The College of Engineering attracts some of the brightest students on campus. Despite tough curricula within each of the five disciplines, the popularity of the Engineering College has grown dramatically over the past five years.

Engineering majors now make up 20 percent of the undergraduate enrollment. Twenty-five percent of the University's engineering majors are women, which is greater than the national average of 15 percent. But what has accounted for this increase in curiosity and enrollment?

"The University is getting a more widely known reputation," Associate Dean of Engineering Karen Marosi said.

Enrollment in the college this past year alone has grown by 24 people. Engineering students are also attracted to the increased flexibility in choosing course work and minors in comparison to previous years.

"Students have the opportunity to take a BA degree in parallel to their engineering classes," Marosi said.

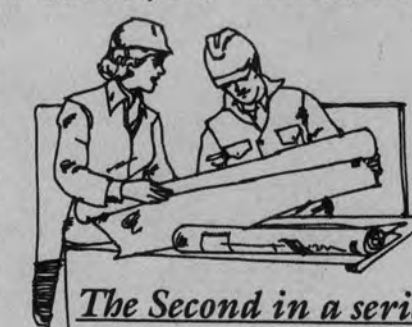

Engineers take 45 percent of their class load in the College of Arts & Sciences. Such flexibility allows for growth outside of the walls of Dana.

"Engineers work hard, both academically and otherwise. I'm impressed with their schoolwork and all other things engineers are involved in outside the classroom," Marosi said.

According to Engineering Dean's office, there have been over 30 nationally recognized engineering scholar-athletes since 1980. Dana Engineering also holds 30 undergraduate labs for a wide variety of uses, and each of these laboratories is directed by a certified faculty member. "Laboratory access [at the University] is much better than at big research schools," Marosi said.

In addition, the College of Engineering employs some 43 faculty members and boasts a comfortable 16 to one student to faculty ratio.

In 1999 the University's engineering program ranked 9th in the nation among engineering colleges that do not offer a Ph.D. program according to U.S. News & World Report.

Anatomy of an engineer

Senior Electrical Engineer
Jeremy Spicher shows how to spot an engineer in a crowd.

Tough on the Eyes

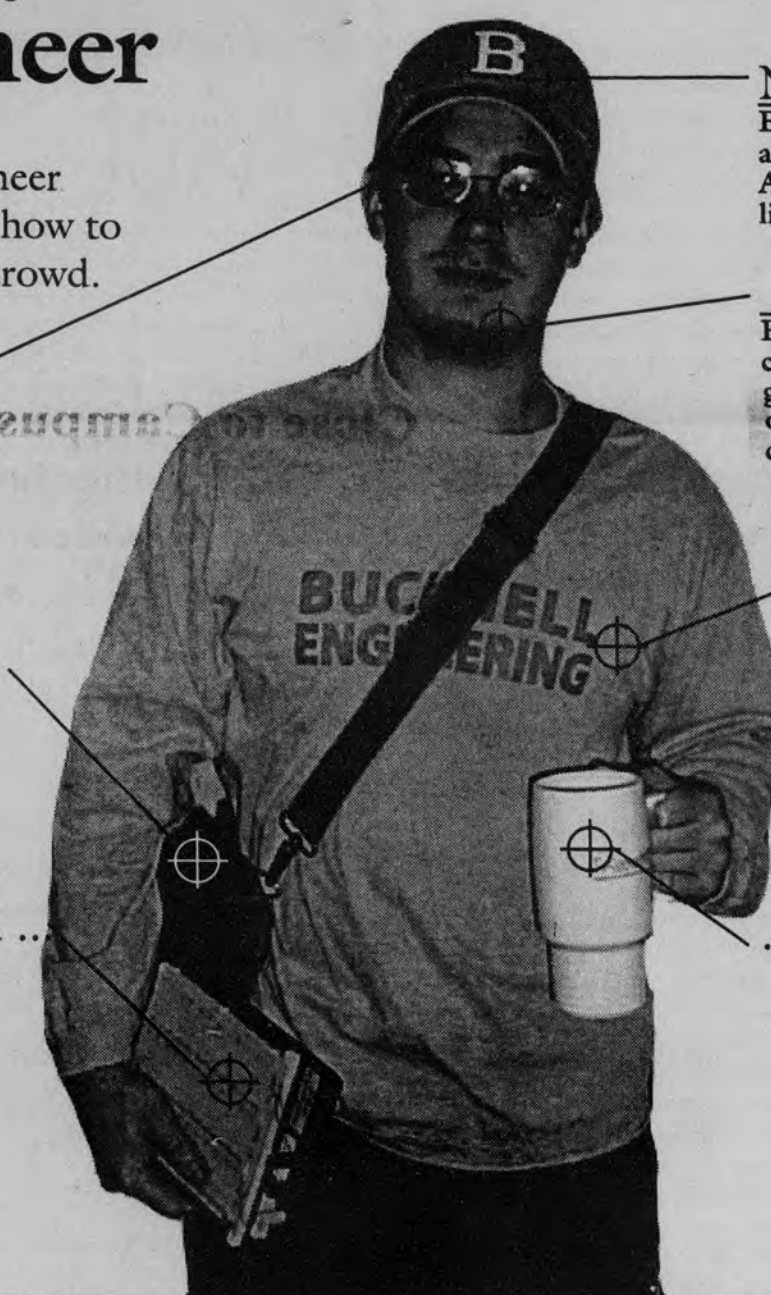

Years of staring at a computer screen and finding the holes on the board can take a toll on the eyes—most engineers wear glasses.

20 pound Workout

Lugging around books for four straight hours of classes from the lobby to the third floor is quite a workout—no need to go to the gym.

Circuit in one Hand...

All engineers have some piece of equipment they carry around with them that can be used to decipher which discipline they belong to.

No time to Comb ...
Eight o'clock classes come around earlier and earlier. A hat will cover up the ugliest post-wake up hair.

... Or to Shave
Even lower priority than combing hair is shaving. It gives the engineer a rugged outdoor feel in front of the computer screen.

Proud Member

Engineers are not afraid to let other students know where their allegiance lies. After all, everyone knows that girls dig Electrical Engineers.

... Coffee in the Other
Engineers are often seen with coffee, or other stimulants, so that they may maintain the level of sleep deprivation required.

Chemical

Pete Kucera

"DANA HAS AN ATTRACTIVENESS to it that is difficult to characterize. Whether it is the personal attention given by the faculty at Dana, the high degree of technology in its classrooms, or its pleasant picturesque surroundings, Dana has a harmonious, engaging and congenial aspect to it which invokes feelings of rapture, fellowship and agreeable familiarity."

Electrical

Niladri Mukhopadhyay

"I LIKE THE STRONG RAPPORT with the professors and the challenges Electrical Engineering has to offer. I can use the skills I've developed on Wall Street next year."

Mechanical

Becky Morley

"I LIKE THE SIZE OF OUR CLASS, and though I'm the only girl in Mechanical Engineering in the senior class, everyone gets along really well."

Computer Science

Jon Lewis

"DANA IS HOME. When I walk into Olin or Vaughn Lit, there isn't the same feeling. Walking through Dana, I know the building, the professors and the students."

Fate of Alaskan wilderness in hands of future President

By Jessica Ryan

As America anticipates the announcement of who will be the next President, the environment awaits its fate in the shadows. Many issues in America lie in the hands of the next President, with the environment being an extremely controversial issue between the two candidates. According to MSNBC.com, the environmental issue is one of energy, or more specifically, the lack of energy in the United States. It is well known by many that oil reserves are becoming a depleted resource, which may be replenished for an insignificant amount of time with the drilling of pure areas, such as the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska. The U.S. Energy Department considers the refuge to be a potentially immense source of oil, reported MSNBC.com.

Although the amount of oil in the refuge may be significant, it is a primary area, home to many species of plants and animals. The beauty that meets tourists' eyes as they enter the vast refuge may be a site such as a coastal lagoon, a barrier island, a mountain or forest. These formations are the homes to diverse wildlife, such as wolves, caribou and snow geese.

Currently, the goal of the refuge is to protect the wildlife, their habitats and the ecosystems within Alaska for the benefit of humanity so they may enjoy the beauty now, as well as in the future.

According to the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, President Eisenhower initially enacted the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, located in northeastern Alaska, in order to protect 8 million acres of untouched wilderness. In 1980, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act expanded the territory of the Refuge to 19 million acres. Unfortunately, the Act excluded 1.5 million acres, which comprised the Coastal Plain, due to the possibilities of immense petroleum reserves.

A once undisturbed area in Alaska, the North Slope Coastal Plain is now a mass of roads, pipelines and petroleum waste, rather than an area of vast wilderness and scenic beauty. Thousands of acres of wilderness and wildlife habitat have been destroyed as a result of the oil development by the petroleum industry. Although the petroleum industries are attempting to improve their extraction methods, damage has already been done to the surrounding environment.

Therefore, as the Presidential tension mounts, the environmental controversy remains a serious concern. The controversy between the candidates revolves around the refuge and its possibility of abundant resources. Republican Presidential candidate George Bush contends that the only way to decrease the surging prices of oil and maintain a supply in the United States is to utilize areas such as the refuge. Democratic Presidential candidate Al Gore on the other hand, argues that innovation would be most useful in exploration of additional energy resources, such as solar energy.

The future of the environment in undeveloped areas such as the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge awaits the Presidential announcement with the rest of America. Although both arguments may be supported in the eyes of Americans, only one argument may protect the fate of the environment.

Protected area within Alaska's National Wildlife Refuge, just one example of the scenic beauty within Alaska's untouched wilderness.
